Americans instinctively dislike monopoly. We recognize that some monopolies are necessary—but these are either publicly owned, like the post office, or placed under strict public regulation, like the telephone company. Transportation of the mails has been a Government function since the beginning of our Republic; and, as Stuart Chase says, "You would go crazy with half a dozen competing telephone companies running a line into your house." (Democracy Under Pressure, p. 58.) But our American tendency and tradition is to restrict monopoly to areas where it is absolutely necessary and keep all other areas open to free enterprise. Thus the Supreme Court, in the Associated Press case, "held the bylaws of the Associated Press to contravene public policy because their effect was to restrict the entry of new publishers into the newspaper business." (Ludwig Teller, A Labor Policy for America, p. 135.)

American public policy then is antimonopoly. This policy should be invoked against any monopoly of the right to work. No likeness exists between the closed shop and such legitimate monopolies as the post office or the telephone company. If, as Teller says (p. 135), "there perhaps was a time * * * when control of the job market, though unjustified, was organized labor's only method for protecting its meager existence," that is not at all true today, when Federal legislation explicitly recognizes and protects labor's right to organize and bargain collectively. In Teller's words again, "the right to combine in proper cases for mutual protecton is one thing; the right to monopolize quite another" (p. 134). Coercion and collective bargaining are two different things. There is a difference between an agreement and a hold-up.

The only way to end this unnecessary and dangerous monopoly is to abolish the closed shop.

2. THE CLOSED SHOP IS UNDEMOCRATIC

Under the Wagner Act, a union is certified as collective bargaining agent for any unit of industry when it represents the free choice of a majority of the workers in that unit. This is a reasonable and democratic procedure.

But the advocates of the closed shop go further. They demand (and recent Government policy has supported their demand) that the minority be forced to join the union of the majority's choice. This is not democracy. This, to quote President Roosevelt again, is "much like the Hitler method." (Metz, p. 146.)

Democracy in America has never meant that the majority has the right to enforce its will in disregard of the minority's rights. Democracy has worked in America because majority rule has gone hand in hand with minority rights.

Thomas Jefferson expressed the American concept when he said: "The minority possess their equal rights, which equal laws must protect and to violate which would be oppression."

Every worker in industry has an equal right to work. He has a right to join a union if he sees fit. He has a right to choose which union he will join. Federal law, as I understand it, guarantees these rights.

These rights are not lost to any individual simply because 51 percent of his coworkers choose to exercise their rights in a different way. These rights are among the minority rights which Jefferson said equal laws must protect and to violate which would be oppression.

But the closed shop strips the minority of these equal rights.

If 51 percent of the citizens of any county are Republicans, that does not mean that the other 49 percent must join the Republican Party.

If 51 percent of the people in any city are Protestants, that does not mean that the other 49 percent must join the Protestant church.

This committee reports bills to the House by a majority vote—but the minority members of the committee do not lose their seats when they vote against the bill.

But a workingman in a closed shop can lose his job if he opposes a union majority.

A Justice of the Supreme Court is not stripped of his robes if he dissents from the majority of his brethren.

But a worker in a closed shop can be stripped of his right to work if he dissents from a union majority.

This is not democracy. It is collectivist absolutism. There is not an iota of difference in principle between it and the dictatorships which we have lately defeated on the field of battle. Hitler and Musolini had their majorities. Did that make them right?

We are dealing here with what I can only call a false mysticism of numbers. The idea seems to be that some infallible wisdom resides in 51 percent. This is a delusion common to both fascism and communism, if we can judge from the lengths to which both systems go to roll up majorities.

Our American idea of democracy is totally different. We accept majority rule, limited by a constitution, as the most practical and equitable alternative to anarchy. But, with us, the majority's rights end at the point where they would begin to infringe the equal rights of the minority.

One reason we must doggedly defend the equal rights of the minority is to safeguard one of the most precious of them—the minority's right to hold to its opinion and work by every lawful means to become a majority.

But the closed shop union is a grotesque departure from American democracy. Its power is absolute. Through control of the right to work, it controls the right to live. With this crushing weapon in its hands, it can make short work of any minority or any individual member who dares to oppose the sacred will of the 51 percent.

I have been speaking all along of union majorities as if they were always real majorities. The sad fact is that they are often fictitious majorities—majorities of quorums which may actually represent only a handful of the membership. For example, the vote under which I was suspended from my union actually represented about 10 percent of the membership of my local.

Too often the cry of "majority rights" is no more than a cloak for minority wrongs.

It is well known that some unions are controlled by tightly disciplined minorities. Others are controlled by dictatorial labor bosses. If such unions have a closed shop—and some of them have—the individual's right to work is at the mercy not even of a majority, but of a small clique or single czar. In the face of these facts, to say that the closed shop is democratic is a mockery of democracy.

But whether a closed-shop union is run by a minority or a single boss, or even a genuine majority, compulsory membership in any private organization is undemocratic in principle. It has no place in our system and way of life. It should be abolished.

3. THE CLOSED SHOP BY ITS VERY NATURE LEADS TO THE INVASION OF RIGHTS GUARANTEED BY THE CONSTITUTION

The Constitution guarantees to the people certain rights. It does not create those rights. Their origin is expressed in the second sentence of the Declaration of Independence: "We hold these truths to be self-evident, that all men are created equal, that they are endowed by their Creator with certain unalienable rights, that among these are life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness."

That sentence expresses the American philosophy of government. Scholars call it the doctrine of natural rights. But a child can understand it. Our Creator gave us the right to everything we need to fulfill our destiny as His creatures. No power under God can take those rights away, unless we forfeit some of them by crime.

The framers of the Declaration of Independence specified the rights to life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness. But they did not imply that those are our only unalienable rights. They said that life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness are among the unalienable rights of man—implying that there are others.

The Bill of Rights and other amendments to our Constitution imply the same doctrine.

The Supreme Court has declared: "The very purpose of a bill of rights was to withdraw certain subjects from the vicissitudes of political controversy, to place them beyond the reach of majorities and officials and to establish them as legal principles to be applied by the courts. One's right to life, liberty, and property, to free speech, a free press, freedom of worship and assembly, and other fundamental rights may not be submitted to vote; they depend on the outcome of no elections." (87 L. ed. 1638.)

Note that the Supreme Court refers to "other fundamental rights" as well as those named.

The ninth amendment is still more explicit: "The enumeration in the Constitution of certain rights shall not be construed to deny or disparage others retained by the people."

There is no right more fundamental than the right of the human being to work. It is by work that men live. The right to life, specified in the Declaration of Independence and guaranteed by the fifth and fourteenth amendments to the Constitution, clearly implies the right to work.

The closed shop places in jeopardy this fundamental right to work. I am not arguing the unconstitutionality of the closed shop in itself. That is a matter for the courts. I am stating the facts of the actual situation in our country, wherever the closed shop prevails.

These facts can best be seen in an industry-wide closed shop—which is the "ideal" aimed at by many unions. But the situation is comparable in any closed shop, in greater or less degree.

Wherever the closed shop prevails, if a union member is expelled or suspended by his union, he loses his right to work in that shop. In an industry-wide closed shop, he loses his right to work in that industry. In a completely unionized society, under a universal closed shop, expulsion from a union would mean complete and absolute loss of the right to work. The leader of the current Hollywood strike was not exaggerating when he said, "We contemplate putting out a bill so everybody in the country has to join a union, and you will be in a bad fix when it comes to that." (Deposition of Herbert K. Sorrell, taken by Wesley Cupp, attorney, quoted by Mr. Cupp over radio station KFAC, Los Angeles, March 25, 1945.)

Millions of Americans are in that bad fix right now—wherever a closed shop contract renders their right to work dependent on keeping in the good graces of a union, which often means a union boss.

A closed-shop union, able to deprive a man of the right to work, is in a sense more powerful than government itself. The Government does not claim the power to take away a man's right to work, unless he has been convicted of crime, after fair trial and due process of law. When the Government puts a man in prison, it assumes the responsibility for keeping him alive, at least, with food and medical care—as well as shelter. A closed-shop union takes no such responsibility for a member who has incurred its displeasure. As far as the union is concerned, he is left with the right to starve.

A closed-shop union cannot justly claim the same right to choose its own members that a golf club or other voluntary association claims. A man and his family are in no danger of starvation because he gives up golf. They are, if he is obliged to give up work. A man may join another golf club, but if his closed-shop union is powerful enough, as many of them are, he will find the door of every shop slammed in his face.

The right to work is only one of the constitutional rights which the closed shop, by its very nature, tends to invade.

In my own case, the right of political freedom was invaded when I was given the choice between working or paying a political assessment. Freedom to pay or not to pay one's money to a political cause is clearly part of the right of suffrage. The Supreme Court of Wisconsin has stated: "All the activities of the electorate, from the time the primary begins until the result of a valid election is declared, are one thing, the exercise of the political power vested in the electorate by the Constitution." (State v. Kohler (228 N. W. 895, p. 910).)

You can read through the Bill of Rights and find scarcely one which has not been invaded by a closed-shop union.

The first amendment to the Constitution forbids Congress to make any law "prohibiting the free exercise" of religion. But a closed-shop union has usurped power that surpasses the power of Congress in this respect.

No freedom is more precious to us than religious freedom, but I have seen a copy of a letter from a union officer to an official of a church, some of whose members had refused to join the union because, they said, it was contrary to their religious beliefs. The union officer wrote: "If we are compelled to enforce agreements and one of your people should take this stand, there is nothing else that we could do but to insist on its enforcement," which means that a man could not work if his religion forbids him to join a union. I am not at liberty to cite the names involved in this correspondence. Neither do I wish to discuss the tenets of any religious denomination. I quote only that one sentence from the union officer's letter, to show that at least one union is prepared to override religious freedom in order to compel men to join the union—and the closed shop gives the union the power to carry out its threat.

Congress is forbidden by the same amendment to abridge "the freedom of speech * * * or the right of the people peaceably to assemble." But in some unions no member dares to speak out or to combine with his fellow members against the entrenched power of the union boss or so-called union majority. It would make this brief far from brief if I attempted to list all the cases of infringement of free speech by closed-shop unions that have come to my attention. I will cite only one case, mentioned by the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. BALL], in a recent article: "A wireless telegrapher with a family to support was expelled from a union and lost his job merely because he spoke up in meeting against Communist leadership." (Liberty, January 18, 1947, p. 54.)

The first amendment further forbids Congress to abridge the people's right "to petition the Government for redress of grievances." But a Massachusetts teamster was expelled from his union because he appeared before a legislative committee on behalf of a bill that the union opposed.

The fifth amendment states that "no person shall be * * * deprived of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law." For any union member to appeal to the courts is practically equivalent to signing his death warrant as far as his union membership is concerned. In Hollywood, three members of one union were suspended for appealing to the courts against a political assessment—and two others were suspended because they spoke up in a union meeting in defense of the other three.

The eighth amendment forbids "cruel and unusual punishments." The courts cannot inflict such punishments—but a closed shop union can deprive a man of his livelihood, often for the most frivolous of reasons. Only a few weeks ago, a young man in Chicago was expelled from his union and his job because he drew a mustache on a picture of a union officer. The union has assumed more power than the courts. The union can inflict cruel punishment—and can make it "usual."

There is no need to expand this list further. I can make my own these further words of Senator BALL, from the same article: "For every individual case of that kind, I know there are hundreds I never hear of, and many thousands of other workers who accept the tyranny of union leaders because they dare not risk losing their jobs."

It is said by advocates of the closed shop—even by some judges—that the unions are justified in going to these lengths because otherwise their existence might be threatened. I shall show under another heading that this is an invalid claim, but, even so, is the existence of any private organization so important that this Government should permit it to override the natural and constitutional rights of its citizens?

It is said that union members sign away some of their individual rights when they join the union. Is it sound public policy to permit this—especially when membership is not voluntary, but forced, as it is under the closed shop? On the contrary, any contract which pretends to sign away an unalienable right should be regarded as null and void. It is said that the constitution of the union permits these excesses and therefore the courts should sustain them. This raises the question which this Congress and the Nation must face once and for all:

Does the constitution of a union take precedence over the Constitution of the United States?

Under the closed shop, it does.

We need a second Emancipation Proclamation to free those who have been forced to sign away their individual liberty.

That is the primary reason why the closed shop must go.

4. THERE IS AT PRESENT NO PRACTICAL REDRESS AVAILABLE TO A UNION MEMBER WHOSE RIGHTS HAVE BEEN VIOLATED BY A CLOSED-SHOP UNION

Under a closed-shop contract the employer must discharge any employee when the latter is expelled or suspended by his union. In practical terms, for probably 99 percent of union members, this means that the man's livelihood is cut off. He may have small savings on which to live for a short time; he may be able to get another job in another trade or profession or business, usually at wages lower than he has been receiving—but these are matters of chance. He cannot do his chosen work, in which he is trained and skilled, in any shop where his union has jurisdiction.

The most ardent prounion advocate will grant that a union might unjustly expel a member. What can he do about it?

The union constitutions provide for appeals, from the local trial board all the way up to the national convention. The convention may be anywhere from 1 to 5 years from the time the member was expelled. How many wage earners can wait that long without working?

It is notorious that some union trials are a travesty of justice. It is not unknown that a man's very accusers are appointed to serve on the board that tries his case.

The average union member cannot take his case to court. Most courts will insist that he first exhaust his remedies within the union—which may mean months or years of carrying a prejudged case through the farcical mumbo-jumbo of appeals from one union body to another.

But suppose he does exhaust his so-called remedies within the union and is still not satisfied that justice has been done him. He may then go to court—and face, with his meager resources, the expensive talent of the union's legal department and the union's increased determination to make an example of him. Let us be realistic. How many workers—even if they were working steadily—could afford the long-drawn-out litigation thus forced upon them? How much less can a man afford it when he has been out of work for months or years?

The average man has absolutely no available redress of wrongs done him by a closed-shop union. The average union member, wronged by his union, has to battle with empty hands—with hands emptied when the union took away his right to work. What chance has he? To say that he has any chance is to deal in fictions as cruel as they are unreal.

It is not surprising that men and women with no income but their wages, with families to support and educate, many with debts to pay, have submitted to wrongs imposed by closed-shop unions rather than face the impossible task of seeking redress.

It is not surprising, but is it any longer tolerable? That is the question which this Congress must answer.

It is within the power of this Congress to answer it resoundingly. It is within your power to do more than give redress to those already wronged. You can remove the power to inflict such wrongs again. The closed shop places that power in the union's hands. Abolition of the closed shop will remove that power forever.

5. NOTHING SHORT OF ABOLITION OF THE CLOSED SHOP CAN EFFECTIVELY REMEDY ITS ABUSES

A poultice will not cure a cancer. Regulation cannot remedy the abuses to which the closed shop, by its very nature, tends.

The closed shop, controlling the individual's right to work, represents absolute power. In Acton's familiar words, "absolute power corrupts absolutely."

The only way absolute power can be controlled is by rendering it no longer absolute. The only way to eliminate the corruptions born of the closed shop is by taking control of the right to work out of the hands of any private individual or group.

If all unions were administered by angels, absolute control of the members' right to work would still be too great a power to leave even in angelic hands. And the record shows that union power is all too often in hands that are all too human.

Numerous proposals to regulate the closed shop have been put forward by sincere men who are fully aware of its abuses. But I submit to this committee that no law or set of laws could be drawn that would forestall all the possible abuses, because no legislative body could foresee their limitless extent.

Who could have drawn, ahead of time, a law to protect the boy who lost his job because he drew a mustache on a union officer's picture?

Such regulatory laws would necessarily have to be worded in general terms. Their interpretation would necessarily be left to the courts. And we have seen that appeal to the courts is, for the average union member, an illusory privilege.

In view of the evidence gathered under the preceding headings of this brief, it seems needless to labor the point of regulation versus abolition. An evil tree cannot bring forth good fruit; and no amount of pruning can make an evil tree good.

The vices of the closed shop are not accidental. They are inherent in its nature. They grow directly out of putting control of the right to work within the power of the union—which is the very essence of the closed shop.

You can as easily tame a raging lion with a thread of silk as attempt to cure the closed shop with palliative regulations.

The only practical result of attempting to regulate the closed shop would be to create another army of bureaucrats, reaching into the internal affairs of unions and businesses, patching and tinkering with a system that would inevitably defeat their efforts because its power is absolute. Attempting to regulate the closed shop would only extend the reign of administrative law, of which we have had more than enough. The result would be confusion worse confounded and corruption made more easily corrupt. Abolition of the closed shop is the only answer.

6. LABOR'S GAINS NEED NOT BE ADVERSELY AFFECTED BY ABOLITION OF THE CLOSED SHOP

The Senator from Oregon [Mr. MORSE] is quoted by the Associated Press as saying, "We have to protect workingmen from employers who want to destroy the right to organize for economic benefit." (Hollywood Citizen-News, February 5, 1947, p. 1.)

I am entirely in agreement with that statement.

I need not tell this committee the story of the unions' rise from handfuls of brave pioneers, defying the economic tyranny of short-sighted employers, to the great organizations that they are today. Through organization and collective bargaining, the unions have won substantial gains for labor.

I do not want to see any of labor's just gains destroyed or diminished.

The abolition of the closed shop need not either destroy or diminish them.

Present law guarantees labor's right to organize and bargain collectively. Abolition of the closed shop will not touch that right.

Present law, forbidding the "yellow-dog contract," guarantees the individual's right to join a union without loss of his right to work. The closed shop is simply the "yellow-dog contract" in reverse. Abolishing it will not affect a man's freedom to join a union. It will restore his fredom to join or not to join as he sees fit.

Abolition of the closed shop will not affect wage-and-hour legislation or legislation governing working conditions. It will not affect the unions' right to campaign by lawful means for improvements in wages, hours, and working conditions, wherever improvement is needed and possible.

Abolition of the closed shop will not weaken the unions—if the unions are doing a job for their members. Any man will gladly and freely join an organization whose benefits to himself he plainly sees.

Union leaders must have little faith in their unions if they claim that the closed shop is necessary to the union's existence.

The Railway Labor Act specifically forbids the closed shop on the railroads. Yet the railroad unions are among the strongest and best in the country.

The success of the railroad unions is not explained away by saying that they succeeded in spite of open shop. To stop with that observation is to neglect the most significant fact, viz, that these unions became powerful not in spite of but because of open-shop conditions.

"The explanation is simple. The abolition of continuous compulsory membership placed the control of the unions in the hands of the employees and prevented it from reverting into the hands of union officials. The employees now had the whip of rejecting an unsatisfactory union. Normal political opposition within the union could not be aborted because there was no job control in the hands of the officials. The result was that the unions became truly representative; the union officials were secure so long as, but only so long as, they performed their functions honestly and efficiently; wherefore they performed their functions honestly and efficiently. Employees in unorganized units, no longer fearing racketeering or maladministration and no longer fearing being organized only to be sold down the river, flocked to the unions. Under those conditions unions served their needs, did their bidding, sought sane solutions for their problems. Thus unionism spread in the railroad field, and thus it continues to spread, because unions cannot rest upon force; they have to be good to succeed. To succeed, they become good; being good, they succeed in larger measure." (Bernard H. Fitzpatrick, Understanding Labor, p. 158.)

With this example before us, we can justly be suspicious of those who cry "antilabor" whenever the closed shop is criticized. Are they interested in labor or their own power?

As David Lawrence writes, "No proposals have been advanced by anybody in Congress to weaken collective bargaining or to take away basic rights from labor, but the remarkable opposition * * * toward any changes in existing laws is confirming the general impression that vested interests and special privileges die hard, no matter whether on the side of labor or management." (Hollywood Citizen-News, February 4, 1947, p. 12.)

In point of fact, abolition of the closed shop will be prolabor legislation—if by labor we mean the man who does the work. It will free him from a serfdom unparalleled in American history since the abolition of slavery.

There is only one argument for the closed shop that has any shadow of merit—the argument of the "free ride." Its proponents say that if a union gets benefits for all the workers in a shop, all should bear a fair share of the costs of negotiating and administering the contract. The reasoning is sound, but the conclusion—that therefore every worker should be forced to join the union—goes far beyond the premises. It would be one thing if a man could pay tribute to a union for the benefits he receives and then be let alone to live his life and pursue his destiny in freedom, but it is entirely another thing when, after having paid his tribute and become a member, his entire life is circumscribed and his fundamental rights laid open to invasion by the union—as we have seen above.

The free ride can be wholly eliminated, without the closed shop. It has been done in Canada. It can be done here. If nonunion workers derive real benefits from a union contract, they can reasonably be expected to pay a fair share of the cost of negotiating and administering the contract. This formula is in operation in some twenty Canadian plants and seems to work to the satisfaction of all concerned.

This involves no signing away of freedom or rights. The nonunion worker retains his rights, but pays a reasonable charge for services rendered, comparable to the fees one might pay an attorney or an agent.

Some such arrangement could be written into our law—not as compulsory, but permissive. It would demolish the free-ride argument completely. It should of course provide that the service charge must be fair and not excessive. Political assessments and other improper levies should be absolutely banned in any case.

The desperation of the closed shop advocates is shown by one argument recently quoted on the radio. A speaker stated that the closed shop was necessary in order to fight communism. His reasoning was that, if a union was trying to purge itself of communism and had a closed-shop contract, it could deprive Communists of the right to work—whereas without the closed shop, the employer could retain Communists on his pay roll. This needs no comment. Having caught only that much of the broadcast, I cannot identify the station or the speaker. For the sake of his reputation, that is just as well.

To sum up the argument under this heading, I reaffirm that abolition of the closed shop need not adversely affect labor's gains. I think I have here proved it. Cries of "antilabor" and threats of economic reprisal are not an answer to reasoned argument. I do not believe that this committee will be swayed by noise or threats.

7. THERE IS AMPLE PRECEDENT FOR THE ABOLITION OF THE CLOSED SHOP

There are already two Federal laws prohibiting the closed shop in the fields which they cover.

The Railway Labor Act of 1926, as amended in 1934, prohibits the closed shop on the railroads—with the excellent results that we have seen above.

"The Bankruptcy Act of 1933 prohibits a trustee in bankruptcy from entering into a closed shop agreement with a union covering employment in any enterprise for which he is acting as trustee." (Metz, p. 145.)

Measures prohibiting the closed shop have been passed by the legislatures or the people in seven States—Alabama, Arizona, Arkansas, Florida, Nebraska, South Dakota, Tennessee, and Virginia. In Louisiana, the legislature passed a law banning the closed shop, but it was vetoed by the Governor.

There is ample precedent for a new Federal law abolishing the closed shop in all industries engaged in interstate commerce—restoring to the workers in all those industries the freedom now enjoyed by the railroad workers, those covered by the Bankruptcy Act, and those within the growing number of States which have banned the closed shop.

I believe that more and more States will prohibit the closed shop within their own borders. But only Congress has power "to regulate commerce * * * among the several States." (Constitution of the United States, art. I, sec. 8.)

Necessity and precedent combine in giving this Congress an opportunity to free all American workers, by abolishing the closed shop.

8. ABOLITION OF THE CLOSED SHOP IS IN ACCORD WITH THE WILL OF THE PEOPLE

Government's responsibility to the will of the people is of the essence of democracy. Under our form of representative democracy, office-holders must periodically stand the test of election, rendering an account of their stewardship to their constituents. The people choose and reject on the basis of what they believe best for themselves and for the country.

The American people are opposed to the closed shop.

There is direct evidence for this statement in the most recent Gallup poll on the subject. (Los Angeles Times, January 19, 1947.) The scientific accuracy of Dr. Gallup's methods is generally conceded.

Sixty-six percent of the people are in favor of the open shop.

Only 18 percent are in favor of the union shop.

Only 8 percent are in favor of the closed shop, strictly so-called.

Only 8 percent expressed no opinion—which is significant of the widespread public interest in this question.

The break-down of these figures by occupational groups is equally significant. Seventy-eight percent of farmers favor the open shop. Seventy-three percent of business and professional people favor the open shop. Sixty-nine percent of white-collar workers favor the open shop. Fifty-six percent of manual workers favor the open shop.

Union members, the supposed beneficiaries of the closed shop, voted 41 percent for open shop—with only 33 percent for union shop and only 19 percent for the closed shop, strictly so-called.

Let us keep these figures in mind when advocates of the closed shop claim to speak for labor. They do not even speak for union labor with anything like a unanimous voice—and union labor is itself only a small minority of the people.

For whom, then, do union leaders speak when they insist that the closed shop must not be touched? They speak for themselves and their own power, not for labor.

Farmers, business and professional people, white-collar workers, unorganized manual workers—they are labor, too. They are the vast majority of the people. And they are overwhelmingly opposed to the closed shop.

Who speaks for them?

They expect Congress to speak for them.

I am not suggesting that Congress should be a tabulating machine or a rubber stamp. I am suggesting only that you listen to a clear and accurate expression of the people's will, as well as to the inflated pretensions of a few bosses—and then that you guide your course of action according to your own best judgment.

I pray this committee not to be deceived by any honeyed messages about a so-called era of good feeling, when hard upon the heels of these messages come threats that if Congress touches the power of the union bosses, they will take vengeance upon the Nation with another wave of strikes.

We should rejoice and applaud at every evidence of labor-management harmony. A genuine partnership between management and labor can ultimately be produced.

But this kind of partnership implies freedom and equality between the partners. Labor law reform is the first step toward that goal. Abolition of the closed shop is the first step in labor-law reform.

The people will no longer tolerate a situation where a handful of men can tie up every major seaport and tie up every industry in the country within a few hours.

It is the closed shop that gives the unions this power. If the Congress wishes to protect the country from this power, it will abolish the closed shop.

The people know these facts. They have expressed themselves in more ways than one. The Gallup poll is one evidence. But there is stronger evidence in another and more meaningful poll—the last national election.

The people voted for a change—not merely a change of faces, but a change of policy.

Union power was an issue in that election. The people had had 15 years of the policy which gave unlimited power to the unions. They were promised reform. They accepted that promise and elected a Congress pledged to fulfill it. They did not vote to destroy unions, but to restore equality and freedom in labor relations. They will not be satisfied with anything less.

Freedom and equality will not be restored as long as the closed-shop monopoly survives. The people look to their Eightieth Congress to end it.

I am confidenent the people's Congress will not fail them.

Respectfully submitted.

CECIL B. DE MILLE.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

TUESDAY, MARCH 4, 1947

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Our Father and our God, for those in the morning of life, the youth of our land, facing the unknown years, we ask Thy guiding hand. As they stand at the crossroads, do Thou turn their feet into the paths of obedience to parents and a sacred regard for all virtues pertaining to good citizenship. O guard them from false pride and selfish indulgence; teach them and lift up their hearts that they may seek the ways of wisdom, for out of them come the issues of a good life.

Grant that parents may add their part sacrificially, that homes may be citadels of care, of discipline, and reverence for age and authority. Deepen their sense of responsibility, lest the hope and joy of tomorrow be put in the balance, and they be sorely wounded. Make us all to realize that no earthly power alone can change the harvest from the seed sown today. Blessed Father of mercy, hear our prayer and lighten our eyes through Christ our Saviour. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

THE INTERNATIONAL BANK

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. Speaker, whether the United States should take over great administrative responsibilities abroad, as in Greece, is no longer a question, for the answer has been given unmistakably by the facts of life themselves. In this meeting of the United States with destiny, we shall succeed as we bring higher standards of living and freedoms to other people, and fail as we bring reluctance and prejudice. But we need not tackle the job alone. The International Bank for Reconstruction and Development, with its newly acquired president, vice president, and executive director, all United States citizens, must at this moment come alive. Its 40 member nations are now ready to do the job of facilitating the restoration and reconstruction of the economy of members whose metropolitan territories have suffered great devastation from enemy occupation or hostilities. The aggregate capital of the bank is $9,100,000,000 and its present subscribed capital exceeds seven thousand eight hundred millions, of which the United States has subscribed two and three-fourths billions and Great Britain one and three-tenths billions. Russia, with an assigned subscription of one thousand two hundred millions—a small amount for so great a country—should join now in this great family-of-nations bank and answer most of the world's and her own fears before the opening of the Moscow Four Power Conference. Then, indeed, could the world feel that peace was truly on the way.

JOHN BENJAMIN POWELL

Mr. ARNOLD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri?

There was no objection.

Mr. ARNOLD. Mr. Speaker, it seems fitting that this Congress should pause a moment to pay tribute to a great Missourian and a great newspaperman who died in the city of Washington last week. John Benjamin Powell, a native of Hannibal, Mo., and one of the foremost writers on the Far East, last Friday succumbed to grave injuries inflicted upon him by the Japanese during the Pacific war. Shortly before his death, John B. Powell addressed a challenge to the people of America to maintain our Pacific defenses strong in the years ahead. Mr. Speaker, it is a challenge which we cannot afford to ignore.

John Powell began his journalistic career as a student at the University of Missouri School of Journalism. He later edited the Hannibal Courier-Post before joining the faculty of the Missouri University. Before World War I he sailed for the Far East to take up a post as a writer alongside Thomas F. Millard, another pioneer newsman in the Far East, who also is a Missourian. It was in 1917 that Powell began writing of the Far East, of its economic importance, its political importance, and most important of all, of Japanese expansion that eventually cost the lives of untold numbers of America's finest young men.

Among his friends and colleagues in the writing profession, Powell became known as the fightingest two-fisted newspaperman in Asia. As a native of the little Missouri town that so proudly claims that great writer, Mark Twain, J. B. Powell lived up to the finest traditions of his profession. Without regard for his personal safety, Powell continued to warn the world of the Rising Sun in the Pacific, of the very same ruthless aggression that, in the end, caused his death. Though his warnings went for the most part unheeded by his own country, he persisted until suppressed and maimed by the Japanese in World War II.

John Powell died after delivering an address to the members of the alumni association of the University of Missouri. His final address was a fervent plea for us, here in America, to recognize the supreme importance of Asiatic developments.

Mr. Speaker, it is men like this of whom America can be proud. It is men like John B. Powell that we, here in Congress, and that we, the people of the United States, must not forget, for it is in the hearts and the minds and the undying spirits of men like this wherein lies the real strength of our great Nation.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. WEICHEL asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include an article.

Mr. BOGGS of Delaware asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include an address delivered by his colleague, Hon. JAMES T. PATTERSON.

Mr. GROSS asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include an editorial appearing in the Bristol Courier entitled "Twilight of Britain."

IRRATIONAL POSITION ON PROPERTY OWNERSHIP

Mr. GROSS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

Mr. GROSS. Mr. Speaker, I am today presenting a bill that I hope will iron out certain difficulties and avoid embarrassment in the collection of certain revenue by the Government. Certain States have community property tax laws. It so happens that I have constituents—and there are many in the same position in your districts—who, if they lived in California, for instance, would pay $75,000 less in income taxes. By amending the law it will iron out and save much embarrassment and humiliation, and possibly avoid trouble for the Government as well as the individual in the future. I want you to give consideration to this matter as you go along. I am sure you will all be interested.

Let me explain the purpose of the bill as follows:

IRRATIONAL POSITION ON PROPERTY OWNERSHIP

The disallowance by the Treasury of a family partnership for income-tax purposes does not mean that it will not later recognize the same partnership for estate-tax purposes. For example, suppose Mr. A takes his wife into his business as a partner with a 50-percent interest. The business earns $200,000 per year for three successive years. Treasury says that this income is all taxable to Mr. A and collects about $470,000 income tax from Mr. A alone instead of about $400,000 it would have collected if the income had been equally divided between husband and wife. Then Mrs. A dies. Treasury then says that Mrs. A owns a capital account in the business worth $300,000 and collects about $83,000 more in estate tax from her estate.

Justice Reed commented on this absurdity in his dissenting opinion in the Towers case and many conferees of the Treasury Department are privately embarrassed in trying to justify it.

COMMUNITY-PROPERTY STATES

Nine States and the Territory of Hawaii have so-called community-property laws. These laws provide that except for property acquired by gift, devise, or inheritance, all property however acquired after marriage, by either husband or wife or both, is community property. Under these laws each spouse may report one-half of the community income for income-tax purposes. The Treasury has been quietly trying for years to get around these provisions but has, apparently, not been able to do anything about them.

The practical effect of them is that Mr. Pennsylvania enters into a legal partnership agreement with his wife. They have partnership income in 1946 of $100,000 and each pays income tax of about $26,000. But the Treasury says that all this income is taxable to Mr. Pennsylvania. The wife is not an acceptable partner and the Treasury collects about $15,000 more income tax.

On the other hand, Mr. California owns a business outright, having acquired it before he got married on January 1, 1946. The business earns $100,000 in 1946. Mr. California makes no pretensions that his wife is a partner, or has contributed capital or services to the business. Nevertheless, the Treasury recognizes Mrs. California's right to report one-half of the income and the California family's 1946 income-tax bill is $52,000, as compared to $67,000 for the Pennsylvania family.

The Treasury Department has been so embarrassed in trying to answer the question of why, in effect, income-tax rates are lower in California than they are in Pennsylvania, it is now proposed to extend community-property State law principles to all States in reporting family income, provided congressional approval can be obtained. At least two speeches in recent months by an Under Secretary of the Treasury have proposed this, and such a provision will probably appear in some future revenue act. This will solve the family partnership muddle to some extent, but meanwhile additional taxes are being collected from residents of non-community-property States.

AMERICAN FOREIGN POLICY

Mr. COUDERT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. COUDERT. Mr. Speaker, a problem that has been obviously in the making since VJ-day has at last burst upon us like thunder out of Greece.

I refer to the inescapable problem of shaping an over-all American foreign policy in a world approaching anarchy, a policy upon which Americans will be prepared to, and able to, successfully stand.

To accomplish this purpose, we shall first have to put aside all emotion and appraise objectively the needs of American security in the light of American resources, military and economic. We shall then be confronted with the hard choice of deciding to what extent, if any, where and how, our power is to be employed abroad to the best advantage. Merely aimless use of American resources abroad without regard to an over-all plan and purpose will not necessarily contribute to a world-wide peace and prosperity, which should be the ultimate aim of American policy, for that way lies American interest. Surely the Government of the United States, that is, the President and Congress working in the closest collaboration, should be able to work out, without delay, the broad outlines of a comprehensive and effective policy upon which Americans can wholeheartedly agree. This will call for the hardest kind of thinking on the part of all concerned, in Congress and out. The responsibility is great, the problem, difficult. We cannot escape it by failing to face it.

I call the attention of my colleagues to an article by Walter Lippmann appearing today in the Washington Post.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. ROHRBOUGH asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include a letter.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. MURRAY of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks and include some tables.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wisconsin?

There was no objection.

[Mr. MURRAY of Wisconsin addressed the House. His remarks appear in the Appendix.]

SHORTAGE OF COPPER

Mr. GRANT of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Indiana?

There was no objection.

Mr. GRANT of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, this morning's newspapers bring us further evidence of the critical situation that exists in this country with respect to our supply of copper. The plight of American industry today is due, in part, to the irresponsible, thoughtless, and short-sighted policies of this Government in the days preceding Pearl Harbor, when, over a 5-year period, we exported some 358,000 tons of copper to Japan alone, along with other critical items such as scrap iron. Today we are actually at the bottom of the copper barrel. The Reconstruction Finance Corporation is now proposing to sell some 55,000 tons of copper over the next 2 or 3 months. That is the end of the stock pile. When that is gone there is no more. We in this country today are producing less than two-thirds of our domestic requirements of copper. Back in 1932 this Congress imposed a 4-cents-a-pound-excise-import tax on copper. At that time our domestic mines could not compete with low-cost foreign production. But today this Congress must act, and act soon, to relieve our domestic business of that 4-cent import levy. We are today paying subsidies to those high-cost domestic producers who account for about one-fifth of our domestic production. At the same time we have, for all practical purposes, a tariff of $80 per ton against the importation of foreign copper. Those two policies are very inconsistent.

The need for additional copper is very great and is most urgent. I hope that we may have immediate attention to this critical situation.

HOWARD UNIVERSITY

Mr. KEEFE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wisconsin?

There was no objection.

Mr. KEEFE. Mr. Speaker, I think it will be conceded by all who are in position to know the facts that there is a very critical shortage of medical men in this country today, a shortage not only of doctors and medical technicians but of nurses, and also a great shortage of hospital beds. We have here in the District of Columbia, supported by Federal funds in large part, Howard University, which is a great colored university, one of the greatest, not only in the United States but in the world. Howard University Medical School is recognized in the field of medicine as one of the great training centers for colored people who aspire to be medical men. At the present time they have some 817 applications of well-qualified young men, many of them veterans, who want to enter Howard University Medical School next fall. They will be able to matriculate only 60 new men. The reason they are so limited is that they are limited in their clinical facilities to the beds in Freedmen's Hospital, which is a colored hospital. Just a little way down the line there exists Gallinger Hospital. Three-fifths of the patients in that hospital are colored people, segregated into buildings for colored patients.

Howard University officials told our committee the other day that if they were permitted to use the beds in Gallinger Hospital which are occupied by colored patients and allow their colored doctors and students to use those beds for clinical facilities they could put 70 more fine colored people into the medical school and graduate them so that they could go out and help take care of the 15,000,000 colored people in these United States. They are barred from even entering Gallinger Hospital at the present time.

I call the attention of the District Committee to that fact in order that something may be done to relieve this situation.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin has expired.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. ANGELL asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD in two instances and include certain excerpts in each.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. GAVIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

[Mr. GAVIN addressed the House. His remarks appear in the Appendix.]

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. BECKWORTH asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include a resolution.

Mr. TRIMBLE asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include a letter from the Production and Marketing Administration, Field Service Branch, Yellville, Ark.

PRESIDENT TRUMAN'S MEXICO CITY ADDRESS

Mr. LYLE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to adress the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

Mr. LYLE. Mr. Speaker, President Truman's address in Mexico City last night exemplified the qualities of understanding, courage, and statesmanship which so eminently equip him for leadership of a great nation, conscious of its responsibilities, its limitations and powers. Surely he speaks the thoughts of America. How fortunate it would be for Congress to have so keen an understanding and equal courage. Assuredly we desire a good, great, and prosperous United States, but, lest we forget, Mr. Speaker, we must have a world to put it in.

TAX REFUNDS

Mr. EBERHARTER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

Mr. EBERHARTER. Mr. Speaker, I call your attention to the fact that the newspapers today report that tax refunds for the fiscal year 1946 will amount to approximately $3,035,000,000. May I also call your attention to the fact that the President's budget estimated the tax refunds would amount to $3,116,000,000, showing that the President's estimate was practically exactly correct, insofar as tax refunds are concerned.

I also call your attention to the fact that there are approximately $1,000,000,000 in unsettled claims under the excess-profits refund provisions, and also many other billions of dollars in unsettled claims by reason of a special relief provision in the 1941 Tax Act. It is known as section 722. So we have several billion dollars' worth of claims against the Treasury which are still unsettled. Should taxes be reduced now in the face of these facts and figures?

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. EBERHARTER] has expired.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. CELLER asked and was granted permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD in two instances.

Mrs. DOUGLAS asked and was granted permission to extend her remarks in the RECORD in four instances and include certain extraneous matter.

Mr. LYLE asked and was granted permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include the address given at Mexico City by the President of the United States.

Mr. GORDON asked and was granted permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include a telegram giving the correct year of General Pulaski's birth.

Mr. MUNDT asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include a newspaper article.

Mr. LODGE (at the request of Mr. SEELY-BROWN) was granted permission to extend his own remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. EDWIN ARTHUR HALL asked and was granted permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include a radio address.

BENEFIT BASEBALL GAME BETWEEN THE SENATE AND THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Mr. PRICE of Florida. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Florida?

There was no objection.

Mr. PRICE of Florida. Mr. Speaker, yesterday I introduced a resolution asking the Speaker to invite the Senate to participate in a benefit baseball game.

There has been much in the papers about raising money for the Boys Clubs of the District. I believe the people of Washington would support such a game and that several thousand dollars would be collected for this very important work. What better way could you raise money for Boys Clubs then through a benefit baseball game?

It would be asking the Members of the House and Senate to make a very small contribution of time. This country has been operating under a strain for several years because of the war and since the war the political battle has been almost as bad.

Do you not think it would have a wholesome effect on our country for the people to relax for one afternoon and say, "Well, we shall not have to worry or fret today. Our lawmakers are out making a little money for the underprivileged boys of our Capital instead of spending millions on some people in a far-away land that were perhaps only a few short years ago killing the big brothers of these same boys."

Is there a Member of this House who would not be willing to contribute his efforts for such a worthy cause?

Let us give the taxpayers a break. Let us give them a chance to yell at us. Let us give them an opportunity to tell us to our faces just what they have been calling us to our backs. Do you not think they would get a big kick out of shouting, "Look at that bum fumble the ball; hit that ball, you so-and-so; run for home, doggone you, run"? I can hear them scream, "Throw him out." Just think what some of the fans would call the gentleman from ———, who may be umpiring.

Boy, what do you think they would pay for that privilege? I can see them standing in line to buy tickets now.

Mr. RANKIN. Why not ask them to play ball with us in the Capitol?

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Florida has expired.

THE SCHOOL-LUNCH PROGRAM

Mr. FOLGER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. FOLGER]?

There was no objection.

Mr. FOLGER. Mr. Speaker, I am receiving, and I am quite sure other Members of the House are receiving, appeals for the extension of the school-lunch program for this unfinished school year. In the mail I received a picture of some children at a school lunch table, and under it were the words, "Must move and give this up by the 31st day of March."

Mr. Speaker, I think this is one of the most humane and necessary provisions this Congress has made for the children of this country. I do appeal to the members of the Committee on Appropriations to make a deficiency appropriation to wind up this year's work in this great and noble cause. The next year's requirements will be for next year's consideration.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. FOLGER] has expired.

INVESTIGATION OF VETERANS' ADMINISTRATION

Mr. ALLEN of Illinois, from the Committee on Rules, submitted the following privileged resolution (H. Res. 120), which was referred to the House Calendar and ordered printed:

Resolved, That the Committee on Veterans' Affairs, acting as a whole or by subcommittee, is authorized and directed to conduct an inspection of the Veterans' Administration with a particular view to determining the efficiency of the administration and operation of Veterans' Administration installations.

The committee shall report to the House (or to the Clerk of the House if the House is not in session), as soon as practicable during the present Congress, the results of its inspection, together with such recommendations for legislation as it deems advisable.

For the purposes of this resolution the committee, or any subcommittee thereof, is authorized to sit and act during the present Congress at such times and places within the United States, whether or not the House is sitting, has recessed, or has adjourned, to hold such hearings, to require the attendance of such witnesses and the production of such records, documents, and papers, to administer oaths, and to take such testimony, as it deems necessary. Subpenas may be issued under the signature of the chairman of the committee, or by any member designated by such chairman, and may be served by any person designated by such chairman or member.

INVESTIGATION OF VETERANS' ADMINISTRATION

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Georgia?

There was no objection.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, the rule just reported by the chairman of the Committee on Rules is a resolution to investigate General Bradley, the best friend the soldiers of this country have. The resolution was reported without a single sound reason having been given for reporting it and without the general having an opportunity to be heard, a thing never done by the committee to my recollection.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Georgia has expired.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. VAN ZANDT asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include an article on the natural gas shortage in western Pennsylvania.

COMMITTEE ON EXPENDITURES IN THE EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENTS

Mr. HARNESS of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I call up House Resolution 118 and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments, acting as a whole or by subcommittee, is authorized to conduct studies and investigations of any action, rule, procedure, regulation, order, or directive taken or promulgated by any department or independent agency of the Federal Government where complaint is made to the committee, or subcommittee thereof, that such action, rule, regulation, procedure, order, or directive—

(1) is beyond the scope of the power or authority granted to such department or independent agency by Congress or by Executive order;

(2) invades the constitutional rights, privileges, or immunities of citizens of the United States;

(3) inflicts penalties for failure to comply with such rules, regulations, or directives, without affording those accused of violation an opportunity to present their defense before a fair and impartial tribunal.

For such purposes the said committee or any subcommittee thereof is hereby authorized to sit and act during the present Congress at such times and places within the United States, whether the House is in session, has recessed, or has adjourned, to hold such hearings, and to require by subpena or otherwise the attendance and testimony of such witnesses and the production of such books, records, correspondence, memoranda, papers, and documents, as it deems necessary. Subpenas may be issued over the signature of the chairman of the committee or any member of the committee designated by him, and may be served by any person designated by such chairman or member. The chairman of the committee or any member thereof may administer oaths to witnesses.

That the said committee shall report to the House of Representatives during the present Congress the results of their studies and investigations with such recommendations for legislation or otherwise as the committee deems desirable.

Mr. HARNESS of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I yield 30 minutes of my time to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH].

Mr. Speaker, this resolution simply sets up within the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments a similar committee to that which the House authorized in the Seventy-ninth Congress, known as the Smith committee, headed by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SMITH]. This resolution is made necessary because of the scope of the authority granted the committee. Under the Reorganization Act the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments does not have all of the authority which the old special Smith committee had and it is proposed in this resolution to give to the committee and its subcommittees the same power that the old Smith committee had. I am sure every Member of the House who is familiar with the splendid record of the old Smith committee will applaud this proposal.

Mr. PICKETT. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARNESS of Indiana. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. PICKETT. May I ask the gentleman if it is not true that in the proposed resolution as compared with the resolution creating the Smith committee there is additional authority given to the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments by this resolution over that granted under the House Rules and under the Reorganization Act?

Mr. HARNESS of Indiana. Yes. I tried to make that clear. The three points covered must be authorized by the House, which gives to the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments additional authority beyond that which the Reorganization Act gave.

Mr. PICKETT. Can the gentleman enlighten us as to the necessity for that at this time?

Mr. HARNESS of Indiana. I think every Member of the House recognizes the necessity for such a committee. Scarcely a day passes that some Member of Congress does not receive a complaint from his constituency against an official of one of the bureaus or agencies of the Government in which complaint is made that they are taking advantage of him, not giving him an opportunity to be heard, or that they are exceeding the scope and power of authority granted to them by the Congress.

It is proposed in this resolution that this committee may examine those complaints, call the man in against whom the complaint is made, and also the complainant, and find out what is wrong. You may find in some instances where the complainant is wrong. On the other hand you may find the agency of Government or some official in that agency who is exceeding his authority under the law. That is the purpose of it.

Mr. PICKETT. Will the gentleman yield further for an additional question or two?

Mr. HARNESS of Indiana. I will be very happy to.

Mr. PICKETT. Is it not possible that the passage of this resolution, in the phraseology that it is now couched, and with the authority that is apparently granted to it, would be an overlapping one with perhaps the Committee on the Judiciary in some respects, and even the Committee on Un-American Activities, both of which are standing committees of the House?

Mr. HARNESS of Indiana. No; I do not think it will overlap any other committee of the House. This simply gives to a standing committee of this House the authority which I believe no other committee of the House now has.

Mr. PICKETT. The gentleman is familiar, of course, with rule XI, section L, dealing with the judiciary, which confers upon that committee the authority to investigate and look into those things dealing with violation of civil liberties. In that connection would not subsection 2 of this resolution that is now proposed to be adopted have, to some extent, an overlapping function?

Mr. HARNESS of Indiana. There is a possibility that some phases of civil liberties would be involved, in one's constitutional rights and privileges, but I do not think that it in any way presents a conflict of jurisdiction.

Mr. PICKETT. Then the same thing might be said in effect with reference to section 3 of this resolution, might it not?

Mr. HARNESS of Indiana. No. I do not know of any other committee of the House that has the jurisdiction covered by section 3 of the resolution.

Mr. PICKETT. All right. Now, will the gentleman answer one further question, please? In lines 13, 14, and 15 the language of this resolution is as follows:

Subpenas may be issued over the signature of the chairman of the committee or any member of the committee designated by him.

If the gentleman will recall, we have been regaled in the press in the past few days over an apparent lack of authority that caused a man in high office in the Government to be subpenaed by the subcommittee of a standing committee, and the authority for that subpena issuance was not the chairman of the standing committee, and subsequent to the issuance of the subpena the action of the gentleman who did issue the subpena was rescinded by authority of the chairman himself. Has the proponent of this resolution given any thought to the probability that we might have similar difficulties if authority is given to any member of the subcommittee to issue subpenas?

Mr. HARNESS of Indiana. I think the committee already has that power by resolution which passed the House here some few days ago, and, of course, that is all within the province of the chairman of the committee, who has the authority.

Mr. PICKETT. Of course, it is; but does not the gentleman think that we may resolve ourselves into the same dilemma if that course is pursued in this instance?

Mr. HARNESS of Indiana. I do not think so, and I do not see anything wrong with what the gentleman is talking about, except the chairman and the subcommittee chairman perhaps did not have a complete understanding about it.

Mr. PICKETT. Evidently the chairman of the committee thought something was wrong because he rescinded the action of his subcommittee chairman.

Mr. HARNESS of Indiana. I now yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

EXTENSION OF SUBPENA POWERS TO COMMITTEE ON EXPENDITURES IN EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENTS

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, this is just one more resolution to investigate. Only this morning we reported another. There are half a dozen, or perhaps a dozen, waiting for action by the Committee on Rules, proposing to investigate anything and everything. I am indeed surprised that the committee feels it must have more power than the original Smith committee.

CONTINUES WORK OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE UNDER DEMOCRATIC MAJORITY

You have submitted this resolution to continue an investigation originated in the Democratic Congress, continued through two Congresses under the chairmanship of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SMITH], a most thorough and capable investigator; and I think that all the allegations of abuse of power by executive agencies have been pretty thoroughly looked into.

You will recall that the investigation was initiated on the basis of charges that some agencies of Government exceeded their powers. I believe that in a few minor instances some substantiation was found for the charges against what you are pleased to call the bureaucrats, who are men and women trying to administer the laws we enact.

When the Democrats were in power we did not hesitate to order an investigation of our own administration. It was thorough. It was completed.

Therefore, it is amazing to me that after this earlier committee has so thoroughly sifted the ground you should come in here seeking a new mandate for a subcommittee clothed with the power of issuing subpenas independent of the authority of the chairman.

POLITICAL MOTIVATION SEEMS OBVIOUS

It seems to me that the obvious answer is politics.

You believe that in some obscure corner you may be able to find somebody who, in the stress of wartime, has interpreted loose legal language to enable him to cut red tape of which you prate so much. Perhaps you hope to be able to do some smearing, duplicating the hard mud slinging of other committees designed for that purpose.

Perhaps it is merely hoped by constant snooping to scare our administrative agencies into impotence.

Mr. HARNESS of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SABATH. I yield to the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. HARNESS of Indiana. I understood the gentleman to say this resolution would give to the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments more power than the Smith committee had.

Mr. SABATH. Yes.

Mr. HARNESS of Indiana. I think the gentleman is mistaken about that, because this gives the committee the same powers the old Smith committee had.

Mr. SABATH. Then why did you not merely extend the life of that committee an additional year or two?

Mr. HARNESS of Indiana. For the simple reason that we wanted to keep it within the standing committee of the House and not set up another special committee. Certainly that is in keeping with the policy of the Reorganization Act.

Mr. SABATH. Notwithstanding what the gentleman says, I am of the opinion that this resolution goes much further and gives greater power to that committee because it authorizes the chairman of a subcommittee to issue subpenas. Surely the Smith committee had no such loose delegation of authority. Even if this were not authorized, I feel this committee would go as far as it possibly could to find some defect somewhere.

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SABATH. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. HOFFMAN. That cannot be, because if memory serves me correctly you just withdrew a member from the Committee on Expenditures and put on the whip, your former majority leader. The gentleman is not accusing him of any ulterior motives, is he?

PREVIOUS INVESTIGATION THOROUGH

Mr. SABATH. Of course I am not, and I could not. I think the question the gentleman has propounded has nothing to do with this resolution. I do not know about the withdrawal or changing of the members of that committee. That is nothing unusual. It is done very frequently to help and strengthen these committees.

Mr. HOFFMAN. That is right.

Mr. SABATH. As has been suggested by the question of the gentleman from Texas, this resolution gives the committee the power to issue subpenas, and gives it such broad powers that I am afraid, despite the fact the gentleman from Michigan, the chairman of the committee, may not wish to exceed proper authority, that this resolution goes altogether too far. I know that no one can accuse the gentleman from Virginia of not having conducted a thorough, painstaking investigation. He brought about some changes that were helpful and beneficial. If there were any errors of omission or commission they have been rectified.

Hence, I do not see why this resolution is necessary. It seems to me that it has been introduced only because it is the aim of the majority, rather than bringing out legislation in the interest of the people, to devote themselves and the time and money of the Government and the taxes of our people on unnecessary investigations. I have no objection to an honest and proper investigation. If any agency or commission or department has exceeded its authority and made a mistake, if there has been an abuse of power, the House can at all times by action here correct it without going through this investigation, which I know will cost the Government tremendous sums of money.

WHERE IS THIS ECONOMY?

You gentlemen speak of economy, economy, economy; yet every day you dump a new bunch of resolutions here to investigate anything and anybody, all of which will cost the people more money.

I cannot see that you have accomplished anything which will either reduce the cost of government or remedy any situation genuinely against the best interests of the people.

Naturally, with those opinions, I am opposed to the resolution and believe it should not pass.

I know, however, the Republican side will support it solidly. You prefer to spend your time here, not in serious and constructive legislation, but in boondoggling investigations, just as you did after the last World War; but again, as then, you will find that such abuses as occurred were by and for the benefit of Republicans.

Of course, all these investigating committees will do a lot of traveling, and you love to travel at public expense. I can only say that I hope it gives some of you an opportunity to learn something about your own great country.

Mr. HARNESS of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HOFFMAN].

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH] should be listened to by the new Members with a great deal of interest because if anyone can tell them anything about investigations and traveling around the country and hiring lawyers and investigating, this, that, or the other, because of his experience, he can do it.

But this is not a committee to investigate bonds or bondholders or bond sellers or anything else up in Chicago. The gentleman ought to be consistent. He gets down here in the well of the House and kicks because "you are giving a standing committee additional authority." Then he asked why we did not create another special committee. He was just hollering about additional authority to standing committees. I do not know whether he wants to keep investigations within the standing committees created by the Reorganization Act or whether he wants special committees. You cannot tell from what he says what he does want.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOFFMAN. I yield.

Mr. SABATH. I think the standing committees should have the power to investigate.

Mr. HOFFMAN. Yes; so do I, but you object to the standing committee doing the work. You then ask why did we not recreate the Smith committee. That is what you said. The Smith committee had $191,500 to spend, and this committee will ask for but a fraction of that.

Mr. SABATH. But that committee has made its investigation, and I do not think there is anything to investigate in addition to what has been already investigated.

Mr. HOFFMAN. You do not? That committee did a remarkable job. The work for this committee is on subsequent matters. Listen to this, then. For instance, here is the CPA—Civilian Production Administration.

Out in my home town a veteran wanted to buy a stove, a heating stove. Now, the gentleman may not know what a heating stove is because he lives in a place where they have radiators, and they get heat that way. But this veteran wanted a heating stove. There was no way of heating his house for himself, his wife, and his kids except by a stove. But along comes the CPA and says, "You cannot buy a stove until you get a priority." So the CPA agent travels from Grand Rapids, 40 miles down to my home town, and 40 miles back, and reaches the conclusion after looking over the premises that the landlord, instead of the tenant, ought to buy the stove. How do you like that one?

A couple of veterans, one a paratrooper and one a former marine, got together and started to put up one of these little sheet-iron houses. The cost was less than a thousand dollars. They got it all up except the top section. Down comes the CPA agent from Grand Rapids, 40 miles away and then 40 miles back, and says, "You have to wait now and file an application with our office in order to get permission to put the roof on."

Then there is another instance concerning Three Rivers, Mich., and another one in White Pigeon, and another one over in Hastings. The home folks get buildings partly constructed and along comes the CPA and says, "You can't finish the job until you see us."

NLRB

The National Labor Relations Board went down to St. Louis, down to Jasper, Ind., to the Jasper Desk Co. There was a jurisdictional fight between an independent and CIO union, so the National Labor Relations Board goes down there and it files a complaint against whom? Against the Jasper Desk Co. and against the independent union and, bless your heart, against a newspaper which had the audacity to write an editorial condemning the organizing activities of the Board and the CIO, and they sent Dorothy L. Craig, one of their investigators, around to inquire of manufacturers up in Michigan as to whether or not they bought advertising space in the Labor Digest, which had condemned, editorially, this CIO and the NLRB.

During the last session of Congress, the Smith committee handled dozens of these things without spending money except for the clerical staff and perhaps a special counsel, and they got relief for the folks at home.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HOFFMAN] has expired.

Mr. HARNESS of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I yield the gentleman one additional minute.

Mr. HOFFMAN. This committee will confine itself to investigations in the line of the authority which is conferred upon the regular standing committee and that exercised by the former Smith committee. I am happy to add that the minority—and I say this without in any way casting any reflections upon anyone who got off of that committee—has now put on that committee, so as to be absolutely certain—absolutely certain—that the committee will not do a thing that is wrong, the distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts, the former majority leader. I am sure there is no man who is better qualified, who has more courage, and who will be more active and determined on that committee than he.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Michigan has again expired.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. PICKETT].

Mr. PICKETT. Mr. Speaker, it is not my purpose to get into another scrap opposing this resolution, whether it comes within or without the scope and purview of the Reorganization Act. We took that matter up last Wednesday at some length when we discussed the creation of two select committees of the House. It occurs to me that the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HARNESS] was very much concerned about staying within what he thought some of us believed were the proper terms of the Reorganization Act, when he said that was the reason they did not bring this in as a select committee. I think he is following the proper procedure in this instance, permitting the standing committee to appoint a subcommittee to do the stated purpose.

There is one question I would like to ask the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HOFFMAN]. Is it in contemplation of his plan now, as chairman of the standing Committee on Expenditures in Executive Departments, to utilize the expert and clerical staff that you already have, or that you can appoint in keeping with the Reorganization Act to carry on investigations of this sort, or do you intend to request funds for the employment of additional personnel other than those provided within the reorganization law?

Mr. HOFFMAN. Beyond question, there will be requests. I never knew a committee to be created that did not ask for something, but the demand will be modest, and as far as I am personally concerned I will never move until I have consulted the former majority leader and the ranking member of the minority, the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. MANASCO], and the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MCCORMACK], whenever they are available. I would not feel as though I could do much of anything unless they advised me what to do and gave their support. I intend to follow their wishes as far as I can.

Mr. PICKETT. I am sure they will give you pertinent and succinct advice if you call upon them for it.

Mr. HOFFMAN. May I interrupt the gentleman?

Mr. PICKETT. Certainly.

Mr. HOFFMAN. I have already called, I have begged, I have beseeched. I call on them now. They are here on the floor at this moment.

Mr. PICKETT. And I am sure they will be delighted to do so. But some of us still would like to know if the gentleman has any idea he can give us as to what personnel his subcommittee is going to require other than the four experts and the clerical staff of six provided by the Reorganization Act.

Mr. HOFFMAN. I may say to the gentleman that coming from a small town where $2,500 is considered a fair income that he need not worry about that. We will count not only the nickels but the pennies, and we will not spend as much as any other committee would spend under similar circumstances.

Mr. PICKETT. I take it, then, by the gentleman's failure to answer the question twice that he does not know what the answer is.

Mr. HOFFMAN. No; not in dollars and cents; of course I do not, any more than your committee over here on House Administration knows what the answer is in each case.

Mr. PICKETT. We are not asking for this, if the gentleman will yield to me a minute of my own time, we are not asking for the creation of this authority ourselves. We want to know what the gentleman has in mind in seeking its creation. We want to be cooperative about the matter, but we would like to have that information.

Mr. HOFFMAN. No one knows what the final answer is, but considering the $191,500 this other committee has throughout its history I do not believe the Members of the House need worry about our wasting money.

Mr. PICKETT. I may say to the gentleman from Michigan in that respect that had he come before the Subcommittee on Accounts of the Committee on House Administration with any figures to show what he wanted his money for and what he proposed to use it for, then he perhaps would have got considerable more consideration out of that committee than was accorded him.

And I will say to him again that if he would bear in mind in hearings that he attends that if he seeks funds at the hands of the Committee on Accounts he should make an estimate in writing of how many he expects to employ and in what capacity he expects to employ them, what his anticipated expenditures may be with full knowledge and understanding, of course, that you cannot delineate it in detail and expect to be bound completely by it for all future time, but with the knowledge that once you have done that and shown what had been done with what was allotted, and ask for more funds it can be justified and he may get more funds.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, I yield the gentleman five additional minutes.

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a correction right there?

Mr. PICKETT. Yes; I will be glad to yield.

Mr. HOFFMAN. The gentleman said I appeared before his committee. I did not appear before the full committee; I appeared before the subcommittee. The subcommittee unanimously reported that we should have $60,000—$50,000 to go to the subcommittee on expenditures, which was investigating war assets, and the other $10,000 for all the rest of the subcommittees. They did not give us even the $10,000.

Now, I can make an estimate like this Committee on War Assets made, which took over the old Slaughter committee's pay roll, and said they guessed they would have to spend about what the other committee did. They gave them $50,000.

Mr. PICKETT. If the gentleman, as I say, will come with a detailed estimate of what his committee needs the money for, I assure him that his application will receive careful consideration and a very favorable reception.

Mr. HOFFMAN. And money—some money, I hope.

Mr. PICKETT. Let me ask a question. I call attention to subsection 2 of this resolution, reading as follows:

> Invades the constitutional rights, privileges, or immunities of citizens of the United States.

Does he concede this gives the subcommittee broad power and discretion in its investigations? And if he does so concede, then will he please advise us to what extent he expects to pursue the authority and jurisdiction that is conferred in that section?

Mr. HOFFMAN. May I say to the gentleman in the first place and by way of a preliminary statement, knowing, as I do, that the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary, whose interest the gentleman from Texas seems to be representing now, is headed by the distinguished gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MICHENER], there will be no conflict as to jurisdiction. He is my senior here by many years, and I certainly would not go contrary to his wishes—at no time.

Now, the Smith committee had to do with the action of these executive agencies. We are not now concerned with the question of civil rights generally. It is when some bureau down here makes some ruling, order, regulation, or directive which it has no right to make, which deprives an individual or individuals in our home community or somewhere else in the United States of his rights. I may say to the gentleman that I think our committee has the authority, but the Parliamentarian disagreed—said there might be some doubt—and told us to get this resolution. I followed the easy road.

Mr. PICKETT. I understand the gentleman to say that with the same authority granted here that was had by the Smith committee during the course of its existence, he does not seek to extend the scope of the investigations beyond that which was considered to be the scope exercised by the Smith committee; is that correct?

Mr. HOFFMAN. No. I would not think of it. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PICKETT. I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. McCORMACK. I notice language here that authorizes the issuance of subpenas over the signature of either the chairman of the committee or any member of the committee designated by him. In view of a most unpleasant experience that one committee had, I am wondering whether or not it is felt by the majority that that language should be in here. That is a responsibility that rests on the majority, of course, because no amendment may be offered unless the gentlemen in charge yields for that purpose. It does seem to me that the most careful procedure to follow would be for the chairman to issue the subpenas, and, in my opinion, the Speaker should also be consulted in relation to the issuance of subpenas. We have had a most unpleasant experience. I am not going to comment on it at this time, but certainly we should not want to have a repetition of that, and when language in a resolution is such as the provision contained in here, certainly there always exists the possibility of a repetition of the unfortunate and regrettable incident that happened only a few days ago.

Mr. PICKETT. I may say to the gentleman from Massachusetts that I made inquiry in reference to the same matter of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HARNESS] a few minutes ago, and from his answer I take it that he does not feel this will cause any further trouble.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. HARNESS of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. THOMAS].

Mr. THOMAS of New Jersey. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to speak out of order and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New Jersey?

There was no objection.

Mr. THOMAS of New Jersey. Mr. Speaker, as chairman of the Committee on Un-American Activities, I wish to report that our investigations reveal that an elaborate scheme of "legal espionage" operations is being carried on in the United States by the Russian Government. One phase of this legal espionage has been the tapping of the inventive genius of America's industrial and military development for the benefit of the Soviet Government.

Since 1943, the Soviet Union, acting through its agencies in the United States, has succeeded in obtaining practically every industrial, chemical, and military patent from our Patent Office—hundreds of thousands of them—dealing with every phase of our technological development. They have ordered as many as 60,000 in one request. And what have we received in return? Nothing. Since 1927, Russia has refused to give us a single patent, yet we have obligingly handed to them in this one-way exchange, our industrial and military know-how.

Russia obtained these patents, for example, by having one of their front agencies in the United States flood the Patent Office with orders for patents. One order from this dummy agency dated January 2, 1945, called for all patents for the year 1942 and part of 1943. This agency known as the Four Continent Book Corp., of 253 Fifth Avenue, New York City, is described on its letterhead as being importers from the U. S. S. R. of new, old, and rare books.

They did it by having the Amtorg Trading Corp., of 210 Madison Avenue, New York City, official trading agency of the U. S. S. R. in the United States, place orders for thousands of patents in every field.

They did it by having the Soviet Purchasing Commission, of 210 Madison Avenue, New York City, file huge orders and by having their embassy and consulate offices in the United States likewise place orders. They even had the Soviet Legation, in Ottawa, Canada, placing orders.

I sent committee agents down to the Patent Office to get these orders and I have them here. They are most interesting, and we shall continue to investigate various phases of this matter.

This is a sample of the way Russia uses her allies. They are mere birds to be picked clean and get nothing in return. And what kind of patents did the Amtorg Trading Corp. request? As an example, I shall refer to their order of April 20, 1944, and list and describe the patents:

Patent No. 2,316,895: Parachute and parachute pack.

Patent No. 2,318,301: Bullet-resisting armor.

Patent No. 2,320,238: Aircraft gun and gunner's seat mount.

Patent No. 2,281,336: Recovery of rubber.

Patent No. 2,320,971: Method of making explosives.

Patent No. 2,321,321: Cartridge shell crimper.

Patent No. 2,321,323: Ammunition trimming apparatus.

Patent No. 2,321,543: Gyro drift control.

Other orders requested such patents as bomb sights, pilot directors, range-finding and flight-director apparatus, and thousands of other technical and military patents which will help in building Russia's military might.

But there is another and more extraordinary and interesting aspect of this sudden and frantic effort of Russia to secure within the past few years all of our industrial techniques and processes. We now know that the real secret of the atom bomb is a thousand secrets, comprising the industrial processes and extension of processes which only American industry and genius have mastered. Therefore, Russia must unravel and put together this jigsaw of processes to get the know-how.

To my mind, it is no coincidence that Russia's sudden interest in all of our patents on industrial development was simultaneous with our atomic research and development.

Through our coddling policy of giving Russia our patented knowledge, she may well be on her way to the discovery of many, if indeed not all, of these thousands of industrial processes and secrets which constitute the great secret of the atomic bomb.

Mr. Speaker, if our Government is to survive, such folly and legal espionage must cease. Consider how ridiculous we are to permit Russia to have in this country at this very moment, 3,696 official agents, while in Russia we have approximately 210 people. That includes our Embassy employees, UNRRA, Red Cross, the Army and Navy, and their wives and dependents. The ratio, in other words, is 18 plus to 1. This to my way of thinking is not realistic reciprocity.

Not only did Russia burden our Patent Office with these orders, they even had the audacity on July 26, 1945, to have the Amtorg Trading Corp. call upon our Patent Office to furnish them with all German patents for 1941, 1942, 1943, and part of 1944. Who was responsible for permitting this one-way patent traffic with the Soviet Government? I think Mr. Henry Wallace, former Secretary of Commerce, should answer to the proper committee of this House as to why such a policy was permitted.

On March 10 of this year, General Marshall will represent the United States at the Four Power Conference of Foreign Ministers to be held in Moscow. I would like for him to take a copy of my remarks with him and to cite it as an example of the type of cooperation we are receiving from Moscow.

Mr. HARNESS of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the resolution.

The question was taken; and the Speaker announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. Mr. Speaker, I object to the vote on the ground that a quorum is not present and make the point of order that a quorum is not present.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will count. [After counting.] One hundred and thirty-two Members are present, not a quorum.

The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify absent Members, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 304, nays 42, not voting 86, as follows:

FARM-LABOR-SUPPLY PROGRAM

Mr. ALLEN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I call up House Resolution 124 and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That upon the adoption of this resolution it shall be in order to move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for consideration of the bill (H. R. 2102) to provide for a 6 months' extension and final liquidation of the farm-labor-supply program, and for other purposes. That after general debate, which shall be confined to the bill and continue not to exceed 1 hour, to be equally divided and controlled by the chairman and ranking minority member of the Committee on Agriculture, the bill shall be read for amendment under the 5-minute rule. At the conclusion of the consideration of the bill for amendment, the Committee shall rise and report the bill to the House with such amendments as may have been adopted and the previous question shall be considered as ordered on the bill and amendments thereto to final passage without intervening motion except one motion to recommit.

Mr. ALLEN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. SHAFER] such time as he may require, and ask unanimous consent that he may proceed out of order.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

Mr. SHAFER. Mr. Speaker, one of the most dangerous boundary lines in the world today is in Korea.

It was created artificially with the sanction and approval of Franklin D. Roosevelt. It was done in secret and without either the knowledge or consent of the American people. It splits the Korean nation asunder.

Korea is back in the headlines today. These headlines are fraught with the gravest peril.

On one side of the line, and in control of 10,000,000 unhappy Koreans, is a huge military force of Soviet Russia. On the other side of the line, and in control of 20,000,000 unhappy Koreans, is a relatively small military force of the United States Army.

Soviet and American troops were reported the other day to have exchanged shots across this infamous and abominable boundary, the thirty-eighth parallel.

Our American commander, Lt. Gen. John R. Hodge, back in Washington to report on Korea, says the Russians are creating in their zone a slave army of nearly half a million Koreans. The reason for this is that the Korean people and their leaders in the south want their own representative government. But Russia tolerates no freedom near its doorstep. Accordingly, it has marked Korea as its next victim.

We are told that history repeats itself. Right now a repetition of the vilest sort is working itself out with results that may be disastrous for the United States.

We all know how Poland was sold down the river in a power-politics deal that benefited no country except Soviet Russia. Exactly the same thing is now happening on the other side of the world—in Korea.

Russia wanted control of Poland and she got it in a secret deal. Russia also wanted control of Korea, and she is in possession of the northern half of that country as the result of still another secret deal.

We all know that Korea is a friendly country. The Koreans fought valiantly against our common enemy—Japan—for 40 years. We all know that Koreans were promised their independence at the Cairo meeting attended by Roosevelt, Churchill, and Chiang Kai-shek. We know that this promise of independence was reaffirmed at Potsdam, with Russia sitting in.

We look at a map and we see Korea split in two, just as Poland. We see that the Red army of occupation is sitting in northern Korea, down to the thirty-eighth parallel. We know an American force is occupying southern Korea, waiting until the Russians agree to withdraw so the Americans can leave, too, and give the Koreans their independence. But there are no signs that the Russians have any intention of getting out. Instead, they are digging in.

The Russians poured into Korea during the last week of the war just as fast as they were able to get there. Although there was no fighting, the Russians went in with a force of a quarter of a million men. They pushed right up to the thirty-eighth parallel line and began to fortify it as though it were the permanent boundary of a hostile power. The only power on the other side of the line was a small force of Americans. The Americans have not fortified their position. They did not crowd up to the Russian line, but left a neutral no-man's land 2 or 3 miles deep between themselves and the Red army.

The Russians at once dropped an iron curtain down along the thirty-eighth parallel line. They refused to let newspapermen into their zone. They would not even let official representatives of the American Army go in. They stopped all trade and all travel back and forth across the line. They shut it up so tight that they will not even broadcast weather information from the northern zone to American weather stations in the south.

Inside their zone in Korea the Russians have applied the same tactics they have used in Poland and elsewhere. They have clamped on a totalitarian dictatorship. They have prohibited freedom of speech, so the Koreans could not criticize what they are doing. They keep out all news from the outside world, so they can tell the Koreans just exactly what they want them to hear. They plaster all the towns with pictures of Lenin and Stalin, and they fill the newspapers and airways with Communist propaganda. And they forbid any Korean to listen to any radio program from outside.

The Russians are hurrying just as fast as they can to make northern Korea a Communist state. They have brought back into their zone several hundred thousand Koreans who had fled to Siberia to escape the Japs, and who have been indoctrinated with communism. They have set up a puppet Communist administration which they claim allows "self-government" to the Koreans in their zone, and they are using three methods to make Communists of as many as they can of the 10,000,000 Koreans who are captive north of the thirty-eighth parallel.

These three methods are force, bribery, and exile. Let us examine them one at a time.

The first method has all the Communist totalitarian earmarks of sheer terrorism. For the first 2 months of their occupation the Russians turned their army loose on the people to rape, loot, and brutalize just as they pleased. When a semblance of "order" was restored, it was the order of the prison house. Koreans were not allowed to travel outside their own villages without papers of identification—and they can only get those papers after they have convinced their Russian masters that they will be "good" collaborators with the Communist regime.

The Russians also announced that all Koreans who had collaborated with the Japs should be punished. They decided at the start that all Koreans who owned property were Japanese collaborators, so they seized their property and put the Koreans in jail. They took Cho Man Sik, the Korean patriot leader of the north, and tried to make him head of the Communist regime. When Cho Man Sik refused to cooperate with them, they threw him in jail. He has never been heard from since.

The Russians in northern Korea have made it perfectly plain to the people there that the only way to be safe is to give up their national patriotism and support the Russian plans.

Their second method of imposing a Communist state is by bribery. They took over all Japanese-owned property, and all the landholdings of the rich Koreans as well. They then proceeded to redistribute the farm lands. They had some 2,000,000 acres of arable land in their possession, and here is what they did with it. They divided it up into communes. They then told the Korean peasants that in order to hold any land in a commune, they would have to work with the Communist Party. The choice was to play the Russian game, or to starve.

Actually, this land redistribution was a gigantic fake. The Russians told the Korean farmers that the old share-crop system of paying half their crop to the landlords as rent was a crime. That extortion, they said, was ended by the beneficent rule of the Communists. But, they explained, of course the new government had to be supported by taxes. And for the time being at least, the taxes would be the same 50 percent of the crops.

The Korean peasants, naturally, were helpless to oppose the Red army's will. Whatever the terms offered, they had to accept. So they moved back onto the same old farms, and operated them in the same old way. But now title rests in the Communist Party, and they are subject to the will of the Communist state.

The third method the Russians have used is exile. There have been many Koreans who would not accept the new regime on the Russian terms, but at the same time were generally so well-behaved that there was no excuse for executing them or throwing them in jail. To these Koreans the Russians gave the opportunity to escape. They could leave all their property behind, and sneak down through the mountains to the American zone. Thousands of patriotic Koreans accepted that choice. They left their property, their friends, and their home communities behind to join their 20,000,000 fellows south of the thirty-eighth parallel.

This is only a part of the story in Korea today. It is a system based on agreements made in secret, and it operates in secret behind the iron curtain the Russians have dropped across the thirty-eighth parallel line. But it is far from being the whole story.

In northern Korea the Russians are trying to establish communism so firmly that they will always have a Communist regime there to help them dominate the future of the country. But they also are spreading communism through the American-occupied south by every means in their power.

In order to get money with which to do this they substituted a military currency for the 5,000,000,000 paper yen in circulation in their zone. The Americans have kept the paper yen in the south, so all the five billions the Russians have acquired have been available for their propaganda activities in the south.

The question is, What does the United States intend to do to block Russian plans to make Korea another Communist puppet state? We agreed with them at Moscow in December 1945 that Korea should be reunited and a Korean provisional government set up over the whole country. But this decision has never been put into effect. When the Russian-American Joint Commission met last spring to try to put it into effect, the Russians blocked any action by insisting that only Communists should be consulted or permitted to have any part in the provisional government.

That is the situation concerning Korea today. Eighteen months have passed since the Japanese surrender. The Cairo pledge of independence for Korea is further away today than ever before. The Russians are entrenching themselves solidly in northern Korea. The job of prying them loose from Korean control is growing more difficult with every day that passes.

Yet, so far, our only policy is to let the situation alone and wait. What I want to know is what are we waiting for? Why are we giving the Russians still more time? They said over a year ago that they were ready to get out. Why are we not demanding that they keep their word?

The Moscow decision of 1945 has never been enforced. Unless we are willing to sell Korea down the river just as Poland was sold, we had better take some positive action now. The time has come for us to tell Russia that the promises she has made must be kept. If the United States is ever to have any position of respect and prestige in the Orient, the pledges we have made to the Korean, people must be made good. We can never win friends by continuing to back down. Nor can we win friends by denying the Korean people self-government, maintaining a censorship, preventing them from trading with the rest of the world, and treating them not as allies—which they were—but as enemies, which they were not.

Mr. ALLEN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may require.

Mr. Speaker, this resolution would make in order consideration of the bill (H. R. 2102) to provide for a 6 months' extension and final liquidation of the farm-labor-supply program, and for other purposes.

This bill, allowing the continued recruitment and channeling to critical farm areas of domestic and foreign farm labor, was reported by the Committee on Agriculture, and it cannot, in any way, be construed as a partisan measure. Therefore the Committee on Rules, mindful of the pressure of other business, and cognizant of the bipartisan nature of the bill, has provided but 1 hour's general debate. This resolution allows amendments under the 5-minute rule, and provides one motion to recommit. As this is a general rule, I doubt that there will be any objections to it.

It is not my intention to infringe upon the prerogative of the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture by going into the details of the provisions of H. R. 2102, but I would like to make some general observations regarding the need for extension of the farm-labor program, as provided in this bill.

Like so much other legislation that has come, and will continue to come before this body, H. R. 2102 is designed to eliminate some of the uncertainty that has arisen out of the economic and social dislocation resulting from the war. For a number of reasons, most of which are directly traceable to the war, farm labor is critically short. This shortage of manpower works a hardship not only on the farmer, but on the canners and other food processors, and ultimately the burden falls on all consumers, who will face a shortage of food unless immediate action is taken.

Because of uncertainty about the supply of farm labor, farmers throughout the country will hesitate to plant crops larger than they can harvest with the help they now have available. That will mean that many thousands of acres of land will lie idle during the growing season. Whereas, these same farmers would plant crops on all tillable acreage if they were assured the labor necessary at harvest time. This bill would tend to remove that uncertainty.

Canners and food processors contract with producers for crops before the actual planting. As I have pointed out, farmers hesitate to contract sale of more than conditions at planting time indicate they can produce. This causes great uncertainty among canners, packers, and other types of processors. Confronted with this dilemma, it is impossible for them to make adequate plans for processing and distributing food.

The general public is not aware, and therefore, at present, unconcerned with, the shortage of farm labor. But it is obvious that it is the consuming public that will bear the brunt of any shortage of food arising out of a farm-labor shortage. It is the duty of Congress to foresee such contingencies, and to prevent them. And that is what this bill is designed to do.

I understand that farm associations, canners, and consumer groups have all endorsed this bill, and, as I stated previously, it was unanimously reported by the Committee on Agriculture. I urge your sympathetic consideration and favorable vote on the bill, and the adoption of House Resolution 124, to make possible its consideration.

Mr. Speaker, I now yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH].

EXTENSION OF FARM-LABOR-SUPPLY PROGRAM

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, during the war, at the urgent request of agriculture, and on a showing that an additional supply of farm labor was needed to insure the continued increase in the production of crops already rising by leaps and bounds, the President and the Democratic Congress passed the Farm Labor Supply Program Act.

The act was highly advantageous to farmers, and provided them not only with a supply of docile labor bound by contract but also provided a substantial subsidy through the assumption of all but direct wages by the Government.

But I certainly do not begrudge our farmers that added subsidy; they established a magnificent wartime production record. It was wartime. Emergency measures were well justified. I supported the legislation then, and I merely want the record to show that this was another benefit to agriculture initiated and carried out by the Democratic administration.

SET UP EXEMPTIONS FROM IMMIGRATION LAW

It seems pertinent at this time also to point out that in addition to outright appropriations of funds the law also exempted native-born residents of North and Central America and the adjacent islands from payment of head tax on entry to the United States and from nearly all other provisions of law relating to immigration of residents of this hemisphere except departure bonds.

To protect farmers from labor raiding, a rigid prohibition was written into the law against paying transportation of any individual from one county to another unless the county agent in the county of residence certified his nonessentiality, with all protection of the workers under the minimum wage laws or possible housing standards.

NEW DEAL LEGISLATION NOW EXTENDED

I repeat, Mr. Speaker, I supported this act at the time of passage, and far from begrudging any wartime benefits to the farmers who made America the granary of democracy while our workers made it the arsenal of democracy, I give them all praise.

But now the war is over.

The emergency is passed by, our Republican colleagues have assured us time after time as they have attacked every control which might have helped us pass through the dangerous and delicate reconversion period without the present price chaos.

Why, then, are they reintroducing this wartime act, which a few years ago they denounced as New Deal legislation, and asking for its extension until next December 31?

I am gratified and amazed that they actually find some of the legislation enacted by the Democratic Party under the leadership of President Roosevelt admirable and desirable and beneficial to the farmers and to our Nation. I am sorry only that the farmers of our country seem to have failed to appreciate the fact that not only this enactment but countless other New Deal laws were to their direct advantage and have refused to recognize the accomplishments of the Democratic Party and the Democratic administration.

They will soon, if I am a judge of political weather.

BENEFITS OF LABOR SUPPLY ACT

Let me quickly run over some of the direct benefits of the Farm Labor Supply Act, Mr. Speaker.

Approximately 275,000 individuals have been imported in the 4 years of the operation of the act: in 1943, 65,000; 1944, 84,581; 1945, 73,435; 1946, 51,149.

By country of origin, agricultural workers included 201,621 from Mexico; 47,890 from Jamaica; 12,351 from the Bahamas; 4,095 from Barbados; 9,980 from Canada; and 1,735 from Newfoundland. In addition, we had 135,283 Mexican track workers and 15,129 industrial workers from British Honduras, Barbados, and Jamaica.

The cost of transporting these foreign laborers, including travel and subsistence from their native country to their place of employment here and return, was borne by the Government to a total cost of approximately $30,000,000.

The Government established 161 farm-labor-supply camps and centers in 25 States. The pay of the foreign agricultural workers varied from State to State, but it was low-priced compared with industrial wages in war plants and to a large extent this labor replaced the American farm laborers who were drawn to high industrial wages. The hourly pay ranged from 65 cents to $1.05 in California; from 50 to 65 cents in Colorado and Indiana; 30 to 45 cents in Louisiana.

FARMERS IN ADVANTAGEOUS POSITION

Reports today indicate that the American farmer is in the most advantageous position of any segment of the national economy; and I dare say has profited as much as any industry in the United States. Various reporting services show that net profits of farmers are 135 percent above normal expectations.

I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Speaker, that I may insert in my remarks information as to the prices which the farmers now receive and the cost consumers pay for food and other agricultural products, in comparison with former levels.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

Mr. SABATH. Under leave given me I will also insert in the RECORD the higher prices of food that now prevail.

Ever since you gentlemen on the left first emasculated and then murdered OPA, cost of living has increased more than 50 percent. I have called attention to that fact before and I shall call attention to it again so as to bring home to the American people who is responsible for the ever-rising prices. Reports indicate we have not yet reached the top; that the prices will still soar. Only in this morning's paper I read where one of the outstanding Republicans appeared before a committee and demanded that we should get rid of the OPA and eliminate sugar rationing and the ceiling on sugar prices now holding down the price of sugar to a reasonable figure. He feels and he so testified, that the price of sugar should be increased 50 percent and said sugar may reach a price of 20 cents. I think it is outrageous to make such a request which would affect every person in the United States, not only the masses but many industries.

Mr. ABERNETHY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SABATH. I yield.

Mr. ABERNETHY. I am sure the gentleman wants to be fair to the farmers of this country who were called upon to reach unexcelled production during the war. The gentleman stated he intended to put in the RECORD the present high prices which are being paid by the consumer for the farmers' products. Will the gentleman also be fair to the farmers and insert in the RECORD the prices which the farmer has to pay for the machinery and for the things which he has to buy, that are made in the industrial centers such as the city which the gentleman represents?

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that I may have the right to include those prices or any other prices that go into the cost of living as requested by the gentleman.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. SABATH. I first insert the cover page of the April 29, 1946, report of the Bureau of Agricultural Economics, United States Department of Agriculture, in order that it may be seen how the ensuing figures are computed. Note that at this time, almost a year ago, prices received by farmers had reached 117 percent of parity:

UNITED STATES DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,
BUREAU OF AGRICULTURAL ECONOMICS,
April 29, 1946.

INDEXES OF PRICES PAID BY FARMERS FOR COMMODITIES, AND OF PRICES PAID, INTEREST, AND TAXES, 1910–1945

Prices received by farmers for agricultural commodities averaged about 117 percent of parity on April 15, 1946. Parity prices for agricultural commodities having as their base the period August 1909–July 1914 are calculated by the use of the index of prices paid, interest, and taxes, while parity prices for commodities whose base period is August 1919–July 1929 or August 1934–July 1939 are computed by use of the index of prices paid. Current estimates of these indexes are published each month in Agricultural Prices. In view of the widespread interest in parity prices and the parity indexes currently in use, a short description of the construction of these indexes, together with appropriate tabulations is reissued in the following pages.

What is the index of prices paid by farmers for commodities? It is an attempt to measure as accurately as possible the over-all changes that occur in the level of prices charged to farmers and their families for commodities used in living and farm production. The indexes are based upon prices for 86 items used in family living and 94 items used in farm production. Prices are obtained quarterly from several thousand retail merchants serving the farm population in all parts of the Nation. In addition, reports are obtained each month from feed dealers and chain-store operators and these are used as a basis for estimating changes between the regular sample surveys taken in March, June, September, and December. Prices were collected only annually from 1910 through 1922.

Briefly, the steps in calculating the indexes are as follows:

1. Prices paid for individual commodities are averaged by States and then weighted by the latest available estimate of purchases of each item made by farmers in each State to obtain an average for the nation.

2. National average prices are combined into various sub-indexes—food, clothing, feed, etc.—by giving each item a weight based upon the average quantity purchased per farm during the six years 1924–29. The subgroup values or aggregates thus obtained are then expressed as a percentage of the values or aggregates for the same commodities during the base period 1910–14.

3. The sub-indexes are then combined into an index of prices paid for commodities used for family living and an index of prices paid for commodities used in farm production. These two indexes are then combined into a single over-all index of prices paid by farmers by weighing each according to its relative importance with regard to farm expenditures during the six years 1924–29. The percentage weights used in combining the various group indexes are shown on page 26.

4. The index of prices paid by farmers for commodities is combined with interest per acre on mortgage indebtedness secured by farm real estate and taxes per acre on farm real estate to obtain the index of prices paid, interest, and taxes by giving prices paid for commodities a weight of 86.0 percent, interest 7.2 percent, and taxes 6.8 percent.

Now, Mr. Speaker, to avoid the insertion of long rows of figures, I am going to take the liberty of excerpting the most pertinent facts.

First I shall summarize or excerpt from a table showing the index numbers of prices paid by farmers from 1923 to 1947 for commodities used in living. This table shows—and I am taking the February 15 reports as being closest to the time of this debate—that in 1923 the index figure was 160.

Under the Republican misrule of the ensuing 12 years that figure fell steadily, and toward the last rapidly, to 114 in 1932 and 101 in 1933, when it began to climb again. Do not be deluded by the idea that this was advantageous for the farmers; for if it cost them less to live they also received still less for their own labor.

From 1933 this figure climbed steadily—120 in 1934, 123 in 1936, 121 in 1940—when prices for farm products were high—148 in 1942, 177 in 1944, and now, with all price controls off on the things which farmers have to buy merely to live, an all-time high of 248 on February 15, 1947.

The cost of things that farmers have to buy to be able to produce—the tools and implements and feed and fertilizer—followed living costs, but have not risen so high because the last Republican drive failed to kill all the controls on those items.

Beginning with 142 in 1923, this index rose to 149 in 1929, the year of the boom that burst, and sank rapidly to 102 in 1933 when the Democratic administration came in. The rise has been steady but not nearly as great as in food and other living items, until on February 15, 1947, the index reached 215.

Now, when all those items are combined, but without adding taxes and interest, we see that the index started at 152 in 1923, sank to 101 in 1933, then came up as the Democratic administration began to bail out the country after the Republican crash, and reached the all-time high of 234 last February 15.

But now, in spite of all the talk about high taxes, we see a strange thing when taxes and interest are added.

The weighted average index number was 167 in 1923 under the Republicans, 15 points higher than with only living and production items; but on February 15, 1947, the weighted index number including living and production costs, taxes, and interest was 221, 13 points lower than without taxes and interest.

It seems the farmers have received some benefits in that field under the Democrats, also.

INDEX SHOWS HIGHEST PROPORTIONATE RETURNS

Now, Mr. Speaker, I have supplied the gentleman with figures on what the farmer pays.

Let me turn now to a table which compares what the farmer has to pay out with what he takes in.

Again, I am going to summarize and excerpt to save space and time; but I heartily recommend an earnest consideration of this table to every American farmer who wants a high standard of living and an adequate return, so that he will see how he has fared in the last 37 years in black and white.

This table goes back to 1910, and the average of prices in the 4-year period, 1910–1914, equals 100.

Under President Wilson farmers' costs grew but incomes grew faster, and the ratio between expenses and income topped parity for the first time in 1917 when the index reached 118. In 1920, when the Republicans were elected, it was still at 104 of parity.

This parity ratio dipped to 75 in the first year of Republican misrule; climbed slowly to 80 in 1930; and then, in the grand debacle of Hooverism, slid down to 64 in 1931, 55 in 1932, and then up to 60 in 1933.

In 1942 this index—and remember this is the ratio between prices paid and prices received—again topped parity at 106; in 1943, 119; in 1944, 115; in 1945, 116; and in 1946 reached the all-time high of 120.

In 1946 prices received by farmers had hit the historical record of 233, compared with an index figure of 194 for all farming costs—living, production, taxes, and interest. Because these figures are a little different from the others I gave you, let me remind you that the scale here is the 1910–14 base average of 100.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I turn to another table in the report of agricultural prices issued by the Bureau of Agricultural Economics on January 29, 1947, which gives a comparison of prices for an earlier base period, then with calculated parity prices, and then with average current prices. I am going to select just a few items; but it must be borne in mind that these are not retail prices, but the prices received by farmers in the rough, so to speak.

Wheat: In the 1909–14 base, $0.884; parity January 15, 1947, $1.90; average price same date, $1.91.

Rye: 1909–14 base, $0.72; parity January 15, 1947, $1.50; average price on that date, $2.18.

Potatoes: 1918–19 base, $1.12; parity January 15, 1947, $1.45; average price that date, $1.29.

Apples: 1909–14 base, $0.96; parity January 15, 1947, $2.06; average price that date, $2.65. Citrus fruits were selling below parity on that date but have since risen sharply.

Hogs: 1909–14 base, $7.27; parity January 15, 1947, $15.60; average price that date $21.80—and have since risen to $29 and even $30. January 15, 1946, $14.10.

Beef: 1909–14 base, $5.42; parity January 15, 1947, $11.70; average price then, $17.30. January 15, 1946, $11.80.

Lambs: 1909–14 base, $5.83; parity January 15, 1947, $12.60; average price $19. January 15, 1946, $13.

Eggs: 1909–14, $0.215 parity, $0.462; average price, $0.397.

RETAIL PRICES RISE MORE QUICKLY

I have one last quotation from the Bureau of Agricultural Economics, this time from the report of February 28, 1947. This report, I must explain, shows that with removal of controls on lumber a rapidly rising lumber cost has pressed the idex of what the farmer buys higher, more than could be compensated for by a fall in the price of feeds.

Now, on page 6 of this report, I find that the prices received by farmers on February 15, 1947, for all farm products, with no allowance for seasonal adjustment, was 262 percent of the 1909–14 base average; just a month before the index was 260. On livestock and products it was 278; on meat alone 319; on dairy products 270.

On prices paid by farmers for all commodities and for interest and taxes the index was 221 percent of the base; on living costs, 248 percent—and that is the figure, of course, for American citizens generally; and for production costs, 215.

The last figures for farm machinery were 187 on December 15, 1946.

SUBSTANTIATED BY PRIVATE INDEXES

The Dun & Bradstreet index of weighted average commodity prices, representing 31 food staples, hit $6.62 on February 25, an all-time, purse-shattering record.

On the same day the Dun & Bradstreet general commodity index stood at 252.33, a rise of 40 percent in a single year.

Read the grocery-store advertisements in the daily newspapers, or go out shopping yourself.

Try to find any choice meats at less than 70 cents a pound. Buy pork chops or lamb chops if you dare.

Here is a big Washington dairy which charges 18 cents a quart for milk, 60 cents a dozen for eggs. A 12-ounce package of cottage cheese costs 25 cents. Coffee which sold a few months ago at 29 cents is now 51 cents. New potatoes are advertised at 3 pounds for 23 cents, and that is a bargain price. Flounder is 43 cents a pound.

Mr. KEEFE. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the gentleman before that request is granted, to state to the House if he is for or against this bill.

Mr. SABATH. This is the resolution.

Mr. KEEFE. Are you for or against this bill? I know you are talking on the resolution from the Rules Committee.

Mr. SABATH. Yes; once more I am going to support this farm-subsidy bill. I do so in the hope and the belief that you gentlemen who represent agricultural districts and farmers' interests will reciprocate when legislation affecting the interest of labor is before us. Unfortunately, you have not in the past shown that friendliness toward labor that labor has for you. Nevertheless, and as I have said, I am supporting this legislation.

Mr. KEEFE. Then, I withdraw my reservation of objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH]?

There was no objection.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, as the gentleman from Wisconsin knows, I have advocated this and all other measures to aid agriculture. I am still in favor of helping the farmers of the country; but on the other hand I feel that these continuous demands for increase of prices, whether for cattle or hogs or anything else, must stop, because the American people cannot afford them.

Personally, as I stated, I voted for this act as a war measure. At that time labor was scarce and the Democratic administration went to great lengths to aid the farmers in obtaining labor from Mexico and other countries. The farmers were able to produce, they had sufficient labor and in many instances cheaper labor than they could obtain right at home. In addition to this imported labor they also had something like a nundred thousand prisoners of war assigned to the farms, to whom they were not obliged to pay the high wages which they frequently complain of.

Mr. HOLIFIELD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SABATH. I yield.

Mr. HOLIFIELD. The gentleman made a very interesting remark when he said that it cost the United States Government a certain amount of money to bring these laborers in for the benefit of the farmers and the big agricultural employers throughout the country. Does the gentleman know how much it cost the taxpayers for each one of these workers?

Mr. SABATH. No; I do not. I have the figure somewhere, but not right before me. As you know I am speaking extemporaneously. The over-all cost was about $30,000,000 for 4 years.

Mr. HOLIFIELD. Perhaps I can help the gentleman out.

Mr. SABATH. I will appreciate the help.

Mr. HOLIFIELD. As I recall, it cost something like $200 each to bring these agricultural workers in. That was the transportation and administrative cost. I know the gentleman's record of voting for subsidies for the farmers and others. Does not the gentleman agree that this is a subsidy for the farmer?

Mr. SABATH. Yes; it was a subsidy to the farmer.

Mr. HOLIFIELD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. SABATH. What I am pleading for now is that in view of the fact that prices have gone higher than ever dreamed of, let them stop urging still higher and higher prices, in the interest of the millions of people obliged to work for wages and those whose income is very meager. We have nearly 18,000,000 white-collar workers and those who live on annuities, a little interest here and a little other income there. These 18,000,000 people cannot live under present conditions. I am afraid that unless this thing is stopped somewhere, an end put to this ever-increasing upward spiral of prices, labor must of necessity demand their wages be increased.

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SABATH. In a minute.

Mr. HOLIFIELD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SABATH. I have already yielded to the gentleman from California.

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SABATH. I cannot yield to everybody.

Mr. HOFFMAN. I only want the gentleman to yield to one.

Mr. SABATH. I always try to accommodate my friend.

Mr. HOFFMAN. I know the gentleman does and I hope he will again. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SABATH. For a brief question, but make it brief, please.

Mr. HOFFMAN. The gentleman from California [Mr. HOLIFIELD] called attention to how much it costs to get each individual worker to this country so that the farmers could grow food to feed the people in Illinois and other places. Can the gentleman tell me how hungry they would get if the farmer did not grow this food?

Mr. SABATH. Yes; I will say that the people working in the big cities, in Chicago and in Michigan and in other sections of the country, if they could not get food raised by farmers, would get very hungry. But before the people in Chicago or anywhere else in the country can obtain food, the farmer must have implements, the farmer must have tools, the farmer must have many things before he can grow the crops and before he can send them to the market. He requires labor, and the labor which produces these facilities for the farmer, making it possible for the farmer to produce, is entitled to live and is entitled to sufficient earnings to provide for themselves and their families. As I said before, with all the friendship I have for the unappreciative farmers of this country, notwithstanding the fact I hope they will continue to prosper, I trust they will go no further in pressing for higher prices.

NOT ALL NEW DEAL LAWS BAD?

Mr. Speaker, I feel that this action on the part of the Republican majority in approving New Deal legislation justifies me in saying that not all New Deal legislation, and which they strenuously opposed, was as bad as they tried to lead the country to believe.

Legislation adopted under the leadership of President Roosevelt and the Democratic Party was in the interest of the country and of the masses. The country produced more, we experienced greater prosperity, there have been greater profits and greater accumulations than ever before in the history of the world. The people that should be taken into consideration now are those people who are obliged to work for meager wages or salary, who cannot afford the ever-increasing cost of living. Those are the ones I am interested in and I hope in the future the Republican majority will be obliged to approve many other acts that have been passed during the Democratic administration in the interest of all the people.

Mr. GROSS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SABATH. For a question, not for a speech.

Mr. GROSS. For an observation?

Mr. SABATH. No. I do not need any information.

Mr. GROSS. Then for a question.

Mr. SABATH. I yield for a question.

Mr. GROSS. Why were the writers of this legislation, those New Deal writers, so short-sighted that they had this expire in the middle of a crop year? We are only asking to have it carried through to the end of a crop year in order to cover up the confusion that the gentleman's party created by having it expire in the middle of a crop year. This is not an extension of New Deal legislation.

Mr. SABATH. That is the very best we could do, that is the best we could get out of it, because you opposed nearly all of the legislation and we were obliged to reduce and to limit the time so that we could get legislation for the farmers through this House.

Mr. COOLEY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SABATH. I yield to the gentleman from North Carolina.

Mr. COOLEY. Is it not a fact, and I think almost everyone in the House knows it except the gentleman who just propounded the question, that the Congress provided the labor program should terminate 6 months after the termination of hostilities?

Mr. SABATH. The gentleman is right, I fully appreciate that, but, as I say, hostilities are over, yet the Republicans still come in and ask for an extension of the legislation.

Therefore, I am not going to oppose the rule making this bill in order, because once more I am going to aid the farmers to the best of my ability, in the hope that they will recognize and appreciate their friends, and what has been done for them, and that they will come to the conclusion that they should show some appreciation for the great services that have been rendered them by the Democratic Party in the years gone by.

Mr. PACE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SABATH. I yield to the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. PACE. The gentleman has a right to express concern over the question of the price and the supply of sugar in this country. I would like to say to the gentleman that for my part, and the part of many members of the committee, this bill was reported out largely in order to assure as sufficient a supply of American sugar production as possible. That is one of the principal purposes.

Mr. SABATH. I fully appreciate that the importation of Mexican labor is in the interest of the sugar-beet growers in Colorado, Michigan, and other sugar beet growing sections. I know also that it will be beneficial to other farmers and to the canners. In fact, as I have said, the only thing that I am pleading for is that we should stop rising prices, if we can, by legislation; that we should hold prices down and stop the inflation that is with us now and may plague us in the years to come.

I only fear that if avaricious profiteers have their way, not only will sugar jump to 20 cents—or perhaps to 50 cents—but all other commodities in proportion.

Mr. HERTER. Mr. Speaker, I yield 8 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN].

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Speaker, I confess that it is with some trepidation that I lift my rather feeble voice in opposition to a bill which, according to report, has the unanimous endorsement of the legislative Committee on Agriculture. I do so for a good many reasons, but perhaps at the outset some history ought to be recited so that there is a full appreciation of what is before us.

The impact of war upon the country was certainly burdensome upon our manpower and upon industry and upon agriculture, and those functions and enterprises that had to depend upon manpower. Everybody is familiar with the fact that the long arm of the draft reached into the human quotient of the country and siphoned away boys from the farm as well as from the city. Everybody knows the difficulties that we encountered and the necessity for setting up a Manpower Commission to conserve energy wherever possible and keep people in the industries that were producing the sinews and the materials of war. So, during the war, there was a genuine physical labor shortage. It is a thing to be emphasized. There was a genuine physical shortage of manpower. So we had to subsidize or supplement our manpower wherever we could in order to keep crops moving. The result was that in an appropriation bill for the fiscal year 1944 there was written this whole labor supply program. I had a part in it. It was done in a deficiency bill, as I remember, and I was a member of the subcommittee that was in the conferences that finally provided that legislation in an appropriation bill. We made provision then for the apportionment of a certain amount of money to the Farm Extension Service in the different counties for the purpose of carrying on a program of farm recruitment and farm placement.

Then we gave to the administrator of the program the authority to bring people in from outside the United States. It was in pursuance of that authority that people were brought in from Newfoundland, that people were brought in from Mexico, that people were brought in from the Bahamas, and that people were brought in from Jamaica, for a variety of functions in the whole agricultural domain. There were some of these people detasseling corn in the Corn Belt where I live. Others were engaged in picking vegetable and fruit crops. So there was a need for it. We appropriated altogether $113,100,000 for this program.

But today the war is over. The war is nearly two years behind us, and we do not have this physical problem any more. The young men who went forth to fight for their country are back home, in large part. The young men and the old men who were laboring in industry operating lathes and bandsaws and drills and all this other machinery to produce shells and airplanes, and equipment, are no longer engaged in those pursuits. That physical requirement has relented with the war. So we have a labor quotient in the country today that ought to be sufficient for our purposes.

The fact of the matter is that we have about 2,400,000 and probably more, people unemployed, as of the last figure that I could obtain from the Department of Labor this morning. One million nine hundred and fifty thousand of those are men. That figure is as of January 15, 1947. There are 1,050,000 veterans who are unemployed as of January 15, 1947. The latest figure on agricultural labor was the month of October, and the number was about 220,000, as I remember it. The fact of the matter is that there has been an increase in the number of unemployed in the country since October of substantially 450,000, and that may be a rising curve.

It occurs to me as a fundamental proposition, as a matter of national philosophy, that with the war over and our manpower back home, is there a real philosophical, is there a real logical justification for going beyond the confines of this country to find people in other countries to be imported at an average expense of perhaps $250 or more to plant the crops and to harvest the crops of our own country?

We boast about our ingenuity in the field of agriculture, and we vaunt to all the world how productive we are, yet we propose now to carry on a philosophy that began in wartime and for which, in my judgment, there is no logical excuse now.

If an allergy toward certain kinds of work is developing in America, do we propose now to appease it by going beyond our borders to find people from the outside to do our work, or are we going to follow a philosophy that accounts for the ruination of the Old World today and makes them suppliant at our door to the extent of hundreds of millions of dollars?

The best observer I know came back recently. He was officially accredited by this country. At breakfast I said, "What did you find over there?" He said, "The most startling thing is that the willingness to work and the will to work has gone out, except for one country."

We have already several millions of unemployed. Then, when we cannot coax men into the harvest field or into a vegetable patch, we say, "We will go abroad and find them, and spend the money of the taxpayers of this country."

I lieve in a farm belt. I am reasonably close to the American Farm Bureau Federation and to the National Grange. They are my friends and I trust that they regard me as a friend. They come before the committee on which I have been serving which has been providing money for the Department of Agriculture for years. But, ladies and gentlemen, there is something involved here, whether you agree or not, that seems a departure from a very fundamental concept. If we cannot get people of our own to work, then we ought to meet the issue resolutely and go back and spell out some of the difficulties and weaknesses in other laws like the whole social-security fabric where a person does not have to take a job unless suitable employment has been found, and if suitable employment is not furnished to a person, that person can receive the largesse of this country which is paid for by the taxpayers and he does not have to work even though today there is this importunity to find people on the outside.

Mr. HOPE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Speaker, may I say that I have a great regard for my friend the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. HOPE] who brings leadership and talent to the Committee on Agriculture, so I find myself always in a distressing position when I have to part company with him. Now I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. HOPE. May I say to my friend from Illinois that I respect his opinion deeply though he is on the opposite side of this question for the same reasons that he has expressed.

The gentleman told us how many unemployed people we have in the country today. Can the gentleman tell us whether he can guarantee that any one of those people who are unemployed will get down on their knees and thin beets or pick peas and detassel corn or do some of these necessary things? That is the problem confronting the farmers of the country. It is a very rea problem. I am in full sympathy with what the gentleman from Illinois has said on the philosophical side of it, but we have a real problem here which the committee is trying to meet by bringing this legislation to the floor of the House. It clearly extends the act for 6 months and then liquidates the program.

Mr. DIRKSEN. May I take the liberty of repeating the observation made by the gentleman from Kansas. He says: "What guaranty is there that out of the unemployment reservoir of this country you can get those people to thin out beets and do that kind of work for which the imported labor will be required?" That is a fair question. Let me give you the parallel. Chester Bowles and John Small were sitting here last year and they were telling us about the difficulties of getting the brick plants of the country started so that there might be an adequate supply of bricks for veterans' housing. I said, "Mr. Small, as Administrator of the Civilian Production Administration, why is it?" He said, "Well, the fact of the matter is they cannot get any people." I said, "Why cannot people be found to do the rough and dirty work in a brick plant?" He said, "They cannot pay enough." Consequently with an OPA ceiling on the price of bricks, there were 18 brick plants shut down, as I remember the figures. I said, "What is the answer?" He said, "We went to see Mr. Bowles to get him to lift the ceiling. When they can get $2 a thousand more for brick and can pay a little more for help, then they can get the people to work." Is that perhaps the answer? I do not know. But it does seem to me so singular to go beyond our borders to find people to come in and do our work.

There is something more important involved here. In the first place, you are going to have a duplication of effort. If you look at the bill you will find in section 2 that this farm-placement work shall go on and in addition thereto the United States Employment Service shall have the restrictions upon it removed so it can also pursue the job of farm-placement work. Let us look at that for a moment. First, on the 15th of November, after a running fight that lasted nearly 8 months on the floor of this House in which the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. KEEFE] took such an active part, we finally got the United States Employment Service back in the hands of the States.

It was a great job, but the farm-labor-supply program was in effect at the time and the United States Employment Service, then a Federal function, said administratively—you will find the allusion to it in the committee's own report, at the bottom of page 2—they said, "Administratively we have concluded this program." The reason they concluded their placement activities was simply because Congress provided a farm-labor-placement program in an appropriation bill. Now it is proposed to lift that restriction and have the emergency program go to the end of the year and at the same time to have the United States Employment Service carry on that recruitment and that placement function. If this bill were not passed, by administrative order, and not by legislation, the United States Employment Service could then resume the placement function, and seek to find people to do the work that is necessary in the agricultural field.

Mr. HOPE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I yield to the gentleman from Kansas.

Mr. HOPE. I just want to say the provision to which the gentleman alludes was put in the bill for the express purpose of meeting the situation which he so well described in the earlier part of his remarks. It was put in there for the purpose of meeting the situation, by giving the State employment offices the right to assign a man to a job on the farm; to place him on the farm, if he came in and asked for a job. Heretofore, as the gentleman knows, that has not been possible. I will agree there may be an element of duplication for a period of 6 months, but the committee felt, in view of the fact that we were operating in the middle of the season and that the State employment services were not equipped to take this over, there would be no harm in having the two agencies with authority to make placement during that brief period. Of course, that was the purpose of the committee in putting into the legislation what might superficially look to be a duplication for a short period of time.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Will the gentleman agree to this, that if this bill were not passed, the United States Employment Service administration office in Washington could issue an administrative order and get it translated to that whole program now on a State basis so that they could go on with the program of recruitment and placement of farm workers, and we will meet this whole proposition with the exception of the importation of farm workers from foreign countries, because that authority would cease as of June 30, 1947? Does the gentleman agree with that?

Mr. HOPE. Yes. I agree that they could do that. In other words, the reason would be taken away which they now give for not placing farm workers.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Speaker, I have expressed my feeling on this and it seems to me we have got to make this transition from war to peace and make it now. One way to do it is to resist the legislation that is now proposed. We must make a constructive start in terminating war programs. We must make our contributions to the cause of economy by preventing expenditures all along the line which are not justified. I do not feel that the expenditure which this bill will authorize is justified and so I feel constrained to oppose it.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN] has again expired.

Mr. HERTER. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. PHILLIPS].

Mr. BUSBEY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. PHILLIPS of California. I yield briefly. My time is short.

Mr. BUSBEY. If this bill is passed, in your judgment do you not believe this would be a double subsidy; a subsidy on the farmers and also a subsidy in the way of unemployment compensation for these 2,000,000 people who are not working?

Mr. PHILLIPS of California. Whether or not it is a subsidy is not the question today. It is whether or not you want food.

I follow two distinguished gentlemen, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH], who represents the great agricultural area of downtown Chicago, and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN], who is my own chairman of the Subcommittee on Agriculture of the Committee on Appropriations. Yet, neither of those gentlemen, with all the knowledge which they have of this subject, has had time to give you all the facts on this bill.

The gentleman from Illinois is correct, that the matter of paying the costs of bringing in labor did start during the war, but the farmers of California, or the farmers of Texas, or the farmers of New Mexico, or Florida were not the ones who started it. It was the result of a new understanding between the State Department of the United States and the Republic of Mexico, which is an independent Republic over which we have no control.

Failure to pass this will not re-create the earlier situation to which the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN] so eloquently refers. It could be re-created. I have an idea that the farmers of the United States would be very much in favor of seeing it re-created, but as far as 10 years before the date given by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN] this same situation existed. Forty years before that the same situation existed, at certain times in harvests in certain areas of the United States for labor for the harvesting of flash crops, the crops that come into harvest suddenly. Some of our fruits and vegetables must be harvested within a few days if they are to be taken to the markets of Chicago, New York, and other areas.

The legislation refers to both domestic and imported labor. The Extension Service, or some other agency, is to have charge of the movement of domestic labor from place to place as it is needed. There come times, however, and these have existed every year throughout the history of agriculture in the United States—there comes a time when it is necessary to secure a supply of labor which cannot be had from any domestic source. Up to the date suggested by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN] it was possible to arrange for the bringing in of this supplementary labor, for the payment of it, the harvesting of the crops, and the return of the laborers to Mexico or wherever the laborers might have originated.

Mr. BARRETT. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PHILLIPS of California. I yield.

Mr. BARRETT. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN] contends that we have some 3,000,000 unemployed in this country, and consequently he assumes we can get these men to go out on the farms and do this stoop labor. Well, that would be fine, but try and get them to do it. It is just one line of work that not one in a thousand will think of accepting. Now, then, there are some large manufacturing plants in Illinois—perhaps even in the district of the gentleman who spoke against this bill. If those manufacturers of farm equipment had been able to produce the machines on order from the beet growers of the West since the fall of 1945, then our farmers would have been able to plant and harvest their sugar beets without the importation of foreign labor, but, Mr. Chairman, these manufacturers also have been unable to get into production, and reconversion for them has been just as slow as this matter of getting farm labor, particularly stoop labor, has been for the beet growers of the West. It would not be sufficient to plant and harvest these sugar beets.

Mr. PHILLIPS of California. The gentleman is correct. I thank him.

Mr. BARRETT. But for the past year and a half, since the fighting has been over, these farm-machine-equipment people have been practically at a standstill, and so we have not been able to get any help from that source. We cannot get the labor here at home and we cannot get the machines, so we need this bill.

Mr. PHILLIPS of California. That is correct.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from California has expired.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, I yield the 4 minutes' time remaining on this side to the gentleman from California [Mr. HOLIFIELD].

Mr. HOLIFIELD. Mr. Speaker, we are faced with a very amusing situation here today. We find the Republican leadership bringing in a bill that calls for subsidies out of the pockets of the taxpayers of the United States for a certain class. I want to pay a little compliment—indeed a big compliment—to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN]. He speaks so persuasively in the well of this House. I always listen to his remarks although I confess I do not always follow his advice—but I do listen to his remarks because I realize they come from a sincere heart and they come with a good deal of statistical evidence behind them. He is, at least, consistent in the position he is taking here, the position of economizing by cutting down on these extra governmental expenses. The Republicans passed a bill the other day to cut $6,000,000,000 off the budget. If you are going to support this farmer-subsidy bill how are you going to make a $6,000,000,000 budget cut? I know some of my friends from my own State will take exception to these remarks but I will say that during the war I supported the subsidy program, supported it for the consumers to keep down the cost of living so there would not be strikes, so there would not be demands for more wages and so that the price of war materials would not go up.

I also supported the subsidy program to bring farm labor into California, and the other farm States, but as the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN] stated, the war is over. We have a growing unemployment roll in the State of California and throughout the Nation. Why are you going to go ahead and bring in a bill here that will require more subsidies?

It does not seem to me, Mr. Speaker, that the Republicans' stand on this point is very consistent. It costs about $200 apiece to bring in these laborers from Mexico to New Mexico, California, Utah, and other States. That $200 comes out of the taxpayers' pockets. Who gets the benefit of that? The big agricultural employers, whether they be in the State of California, Louisiana, Florida, or wherever they are located. They get these employees at a reduced rate. They would probably have to pay a little more if they went into the open labor market, but they get cheap labor by this bill. It is all right with me for them to get cheap labor, but if they are so anxious to get this cheap labor, why do they not pay the $200 themselves? Why do they come to the tax treasury of the United States to get this $200?

Just recently there was a change made in the definition of "agricultural employment." They can bring these men in not only to work in the fields but also to work in packing sheds, to truck vegetables, and to go into all the other fields of endeavor that have some close association with agriculture. You will find here a very easy means of bringing in cheap labor to cut down on the American standard of living and the American wage scale.

Mr. KEEFE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOLIFIELD. I yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. KEEFE. Is the gentleman familiar with the contracts under which foreign labor is brought into this country under this program?

Mr. HOLIFIELD. I am.

Mr. KEEFE. Does the gentleman find any provision in those contracts for importing cheap labor? Is not the wage paid to these people who are brought in the wage rate that is agreed upon between two sovereign governments, and is it not compatible with the wage rate that is paid in that area of the United States?

Mr. HOLIFIELD. Part of what the gentleman says is very true.

Mr. KEEFE. It is not cheap labor, is it?

Mr. HOLIFIELD. Oh, yes; it is, and I will tell you why. If the gentleman's contractual agreements were not made on the basis of a certain minimum of 75 cents an hour, then the agricultural employer would have to go into the field of American labor and pay whatever was necessary to get the labor. That is why it is a contractual agreement in behalf of cheap labor.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from California has expired.

Mr. HERTER. Mr. Speaker, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. RIZLEY].

Mr. RIZLEY. Mr. Speaker, it is hard to tell from this debate today whether this is a politically controversial matter; but I am sure that there is one event, upon which we can all agree at this point in the debate, that is not controversial. If I mistake not, it was 34 years ago today that the former distinguished Speaker of this House the gentleman from Texas, the Honorable SAM RAYBURN, commenced his membership in this body, and from this side of the aisle I am sure we can also say it is not a controversial political matter as to whether he has rendered a fine service to the people of Texas and to the people of this country during that 34 years.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I feel it is well at this time to pause to pay our respects to the former distinguished Speaker. The House of Representatives has been his life and love. Permanent history will record his work as one of the great Speakers of this Republic. We congratulate you, Mr. Speaker, and if you continue to reside in Texas we hope for you 34 more years of service. We cannot elect Republicans down there.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Oklahoma has expired.

Mr. HERTER. Mr. Speaker, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. EDWIN ARTHUR HALL].

Mr. EDWIN ARTHUR HALL. Mr. Speaker, I am somewhat surprised that the opposition has stated this is a continuation of the farm-labor program. I voted in committee to support the chairman of the committee the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. HOPE] on the premise that we would wind up the affairs of this whole farm-labor program as soon as possible.

As an operator of a small family-sized farm myself, I found one way to overcome the farm-labor shortage. Fortunately, unlike many others, I have four boys and two girls, and I have been able to divide the duties of our farm among the six children, so that they take the burden off me to quite some extent. I am not a large operator by acreage but I can say that so far as the farm-labor shortage goes on my farm premises I have not suffered from it.

Mrs. BOLTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. EDWIN ARTHUR HALL. I yield to the gentlewoman from Ohio.

Mrs. BOLTON. As a mother and a grandmother, may I inquire whether the gentleman is obeying the child-labor laws?

Mr. EDWIN ARTHUR HALL. I want to assure the gentlewoman that question would hardly enter into my picture, because, first, the children like to do their 1 hour's work a day, and second, they are doing it for themselves for eventually they will divide what few earthly goods I have anyway.

Mr. BUSBEY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. EDWIN ARTHUR HALL. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. BUSBEY. If the gentleman from New York thought that he was voting with the chairman of the committee to bring a termination of this about, I refer him to the title of the bill which says, "To provide for a 6 months' extension."

Mr. EDWIN ARTHUR HALL. I direct the gentleman's attention to the further title of the bill which mentions the fact that it winds up the farm-labor program. He should have continued reading the title. There is no dispute about the fact that this program has worked out, and I think we can wind it up at this time by passing this bill.

If the passage of this bill does nothing more than to harvest this coming season's sugar beet crop, as is one of its objectives, it will be justified.

Frankly, I am alarmed at the mail I receive from home about the lack of sugar everywhere in America. To a favored few, who are able to get all the sugar they need from hidden and forbidden sources, this shortage seems like a big joke. I have been challenged by that selfish group, because I want to see us all get enough sugar.

These favored few are now raising the cry that we do not need to harvest the beet-sugar crop. The answer to them is, you will have a little revolution on your hands if you keep the housewives from getting more sugar. You may not realize how mad people are about this since you have enough yourselves. But give the rest of us a break. Let us get behind this program and see it through to a successful conclusion.

Mr. HERTER. Mr. Speaker, I yield the balance of the time to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN].

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. Mr. Speaker, during the years that I have served on the Committee on Agriculture, when this legislation has been under consideration, we have never made it a political or partisan issue, and it is not that today, in spite of the fact that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH] would indicate that this was originally a New Deal measure, sponsored by the late President Roosevelt, to which the Republicans are now giving support. It was never a New Deal measure. It was a measure that was brought about by force of necessity to secure vital food production in this country.

Now, I dislike very much to continue a program of this kind. If it were not for the fact that certain laboring men in our large cities, like Chicago, do not desire to go out and do this hand work on the farms, and produce sugar beet and vegetable crops, why, there would not be any need for it. If the gentleman from Illinois would convince his people that they should go out and do this hand work on the American farms to produce sugar beets and vegetable crops and the other crops requiring a great deal of hand work, why, then you could do away with it here today.

We are now trying to get more sugar for the American people. To get it we must produce more in the United States. That takes hand labor, and unless we get this hand labor in the last 6 months of the year there will be less sugar for the American housewives and for the American consumers generally throughout the country. Now, to break off the program in the middle of the year, when the southern half of the country has had its required labor, and then leave the sugar-beet crops and the vegetable crops in Northern States to the mercy of prospects of getting American labor, why, that is just nonsensical and the people will suffer from it.

I would like to point out another thing in the remarks made by the gentleman from Illinois, who always claims to be such a defender of the American farmers. This measure is not in the interest of the farmers of the country. This is in the interest of the consumers of the United States so that they will have more sugar and cheaper sugar, and more vegetables and cheaper vegetables. Unless we are willing to subscribe to continuing the program for the balance of the year and then liquidate it and then take our chances in the future, why you can see there will be a scarcity of sugar and a scarcity of vegetable crops.

There may be one way out of it, and I think it could well be explored by the Congress. We have an overpopulation in Puerto Rico. What is the matter with bringing in about 25,000 Puerto Ricans to do some of this work? They claim status as American citizens. Or what is the matter with permitting some of these refugees that have been brought into the United States by the millions, you might say, to go out and work in the fields? No; they do not want to do that kind of work. So we are up against a practical situation here, a situation which deals with the reality of furnishing the people of the United States with vital food products. Therefore, I definitely feel that this legislation should be continued in the interest of the general welfare and to enable all the people of the country to secure more food.

Mr. GRANGER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. I yield to the gentleman from Utah.

Mr. GRANGER. Everything that has been said here today, of course, the committee has considered. I think the opinion of the committee generally was the opinion expressed by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN]. But the situation, after we have heard all the evidence, discloses the fact that this program is going to run to mid-year anyhow. Most of the expense has already been incurred. To extend it another 6 months certainly is not going to cost the United States Treasury a lot more money.

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. I agree with the gentleman, and in conclusion I urge the passage of the bill which will provide labor for the sugar beet and fruit and vegetable areas, with final liquidation of the law on December 31 of this year.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Minnesota has expired.

Mr. HERTER. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the resolution.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

Mr. HOPE. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 2102) to provide for a 6 months' extension and final liquidation of the farm-labor-supply program, and for other purposes.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 2102, with Mr. SPRINGER in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

By unanimous consent, the first reading of the bill was dispensed with.

Mr. HOPE. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 8 minutes.

Mr. Chairman, this bill extends for 6 months and provides for the final liquidation at the time of the farm-labor program, which was first set up in this country back in 1943 as a war measure. Since that time it had been renewed from year to year. This year, if no action is taken, the program will expire on July 1 next—right in the middle of the crop season.

The program consists of two parts: First, there is the foreign-labor program, which deals with the importation of labor into this country from Mexico and the West Indies. That has been running about 80,000 or 85,000 persons a year, and the estimates for this year are about the same. In addition, there is the domestic labor-placement program, whereby the extension services in the various States have undertaken the work of placing workers on the farms.

The war is over, as has been said here several times this afternoon, but the emergency, as far as the production of food is concerned, is not over.

I call your attention to the fact that the acreage goals which the Secretary of Agriculture has requested the farmers to reach this year are greater than the actual acreage at any time during the war years. So we have the farmers of this country being asked this year to produce more than they actually did produce at any time during the war. That is going to take labor. It is true, as has been stated on the floor this afternoon, that we have some people unemployed in this country, and if anyone can give me any assurance that those people who are unemployed will go out in the beet fields and vegetable fields of this country and do the hard, tough, stoop labor which is so important, then I would be the first to say that we do not need this extension. But the committee was given no assurance of that kind. In fact, all the evidence which the committee had on the question indicated there was no possibility of getting this work performed except through the importation of foreign labor.

We had before us farmers and representatives of farm organizations from all parts of the country. The tenor of all their testimony was that they would much prefer to use native labor; that this foreign labor was not satisfactory, but it was the best they could get. They wanted it because they could not get anything any better.

It is important to pass this legislation now because this is the time of the year when the producers of sugar beets are signing up their contracts with the sugar factories and when the producers of canning crops must sign up their contracts with the canning factories. Unless those farmers can be given the assurance that they are going to have the labor to plant and harvest those crops, they cannot and they dare not sign the contracts to produce them. That is the reason the legislation is before us at this time. It is an emergency matter because if we cannot give this assurance during this month, then we are going to be faced with a continual shortage of sugar in this country and a shortage of vegetables which go into cans.

Mr. BUCK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. HOPE. I am glad to yield to the gentleman for a question.

Mr. BUCK. Will the gentleman tell us why this foreign labor would not also be necessary in 1948?

Mr. HOPE. May I say to the gentleman it may be necessary to have foreign labor in 1948. One reason we are bringing this legislation in at this time is to serve notice on the people who have been using this foreign labor that they will have to make some other arrangements in 1948. I do not know whether or not it will be necessary in 1948. In some lines of production, particularly in the production of sugar beets, mechanization is going to do a lot of this work. It is going to overcome the need for much of this hand labor. But, as was stated by the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. BARRETT], a while ago, mechanization is just beginning. The farmers cannot get the machinery as yet which they need to plant and harvest sugar beets and thus avoid a great deal of this hand labor.

Mr. ZIMMERMAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOPE. I yield to the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. ZIMMERMAN. Further answering the question of the gentleman from New York, I think we must remember that these farmers are now making their plans for this crop year and entering into these contracts. When the time comes to make plans for the crop year in 1948, the farmers will know that this law is expiring. In other words, this farm-labor program is being terminated and the farmer will be making his plans with the knowledge that he will not have this foreign labor. But if we do not continue this program this year, we are going to break faith with the farmers, and I know no one in this Congress wants to break faith with the farmers of this country, who have gone on the assumption that they would have this labor for this year.

Mr. EDWIN ARTHUR HALL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOPE. I yield.

Mr. EDWIN ARTHUR HALL. Am I correct in stating that every responsible farm organization in the country, or nearly every one of them, is for this bill?

Mr. HOPE. Yes; I can say to the gentleman that the farm organizations which appeared before the committee—and nearly all of them did—urgently requested the passage of this legislation.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HOPE. I yield myself two additional minutes, Mr. Chairman.

I may say further to the gentleman from New York [Mr. BUCK] there are other ways by which this foreign labor can be brought in. Under existing law, this is the only way; but if we decide later in this year that it may be necessary to bring in foreign labor in another year, then I think we can pass legislation which will make it possible for the farmers themselves or cooperative organizations of farmers to bring in this labor. But it is not possible at this time to work out the details of that kind of a program because we must know within a few weeks what the farmers can depend upon in the way of labor this year.

The question was asked a while ago as to how much this will cost. The estimates by the Department of Agriculture are that it will cost an additional $10,000,000 to extend the program for 6 months. I am not sure that means that $10,000,000 more than would otherwise be spent will actually have to be spent, because many of these foreigners are now in the country. Under the agreement they have to be taken back at the end of this program. It is not going to cost any more to take those now here back in December than in June, and we will have the benefit of their labor during that period.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOPE. I yield.

Mr. CRAWFORD. The farmers of our country today are hesitating in mapping out their 1947 plantings for fear these workers will be returned as of June 30 this year. We should settle this question and settle it positively without further delay with respect to the 1947 crop year.

One other thought. I do not know of any surer way to prevent production of canned vegetables or to prevent the gathering of fruit crops this summer, or to further aggravate the shortage of sugar in this country, than to fail to pass this bill.

Mr. HOPE. I agree with the gentleman 100 percent.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Kansas has again expired.

Mr. FLANNAGAN. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 5 minutes.

Mr. Chairman, under ordinary circumstances I would be bitterly opposed to this legislation. In the beginning I want to eliminate some of the driftwood that has been brought in. This is not a continuation of so-called New Deal legislation. It is not a continuation of Republican legislation. It is not a continuation of the so-called subsidy program. This legislation originally was considered in a nonpartisan manner and unanimously reported out of the Committee on Agriculture, because the necessity brought about by the war forced us to report the legislation.

No one is more bitterly opposed to farm subsidies than I am. I have never been in favor of the farm-subsidy program, because I have always believed and still believe the farmer is entitled to a fair price in the market place for what he produces.

Mr. Chairman, as I say, this legislation was the outgrowth of the necessity to increase our food production during the war. We found that it was necessary for the Government to go out and bring in the Mexican and this other foreign labor in order to keep our food supply up to the requirements. We went into it with our eyes open. What is the situation? Here are the farmers who were urged to produce. That urge was so great that the Federal Government went out and brought in farm labor in order to enable them to produce. This legislation as originally passed and as continued from time to time was extended from one fiscal year to the next fiscal year. Now we want to wind the program up. I want to wind it up at the earliest moment possible; but is it right to wind this program up in the middle of the crop season, especially when the demand is still upon us? Is not the decent thing, the fair thing, to do to give the farmers time within which to make the readjustment? We are serving notice on them today that this program will be discontinued at the end of this year, and that is the only reason I am here supporting this legislation. I do not want to get the farmer out on a limb, encourage him to get out on that limb, and then come in here with a hacksaw and saw the limb off; I want to give him an opportunity to climb back down the tree and get his feet on the ground. That is all we are asking you to do in this legislation. This legislation, as I say, is not a piece of so-called New Deal legislation, a piece of Democratic legislation, or a piece of Republican legislation. It was reported out originally, as I remember, by a unanimous vote of the House Committee on Agriculture, and it has been extended every year by a unanimous vote. During the hearings we carefully went into the situation of winding it up but thought that it would be unfair to wind it up in the middle of the crop season. After full and complete hearings we unanimously agreed to wind the program up at the end of this year.

Mr. MILLER of Connecticut. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FLANNAGAN. I yield.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Virginia has expired.

Mr. FLANNAGAN. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself one additional minute.

Mr. MILLER of Connecticut. I may say that last year in Connecticut the potato crop could not have been harvested had it not been for the Jamaicans who were in that area to harvest the shade-grown tobacco crop. They have been a well-behaved group. I have had them reside within a mile of my home and would never know they were in the community. They have been a very desirable class of workmen.

Mr. FLANNAGAN. Let me say to the gentleman from Connecticut that that situation prevails not only in the Northeast but in every section of America.

These farm laborers were brought in in order to enable the farmers to meet the crop goals that had been set by the Secretary of Agriculture as being necessary in order to sustain our war effort.

Mr. MILLER of Connecticut. If the gentleman will yield further, may I say also that these same farmers have made their commitments, plowed their land, bought their seed and fertilizer for this year, assuming that this labor would be available.

Mr. FLANNAGAN. The gentleman is right.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Virginia has again expired.

Mr. HOPE. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GROSS].

Mr. GROSS. Mr. Chairman, there has been a lot of loose talk and there have been a great many erroneous statements made before the committee.

I am going to support this bill for the simple reason that otherwise the program would fold up in the middle of the crop year and create a lot of confusion.

Mr. Chairman, in order to get the slant from my own people I sent out a questionnaire recently asking certain questions. You know, this request comes from men down in the Department who want this thing to go on indefinitely in order to continue their jobs and make them permanent. They came in and asked for this program and that it be made permanent.

I made that point my first question and every answer that came back said, "No; this should not be made permanent."

The second question was: "Do you believe the program should be extended until the end of the crop year?" About 75 percent of the questionnaires returned said it should because of the confusion that had been created by folding it up in the middle of the crop year.

I also asked whether they found these workers satisfactory and the majority said they were better than no help at all, but not satisfactory.

I asked them this question: "Do you believe farm labor for 1947 could and should be recruited from the ranks of the unemployed within the United States?" The general feeling was that help should be recruited from the ranks of the unemployed, but a good many questioned whether it could be done as long as men get $20 a week for not working.

Those fellows down in the Department were very strong in telling us that the farmers want this labor. It was definitely stated by them that the State of Pennsylvania wants 600 of them. So I added another question and I asked: "Have you been consulted by any Federal agency concerning your labor requirements for 1947?" Two said they were consulted and told them they would not need any. Every one of the other answerers replied: "We were not consulted."

This goes to show that the men down in the Department of Agriculture have strenuously misrepresented the case. It is not true that the farmers want this help because they are cheap. I have seen man and wife migrants from Florida digging potatoes in my district getting $30 a day. I have seen Puerto Ricans and Jamaicans getting $16 a day picking cherries.

Mr. Chairman, the farmers do not want this labor. They all want this program to be folded up at the end of the crop year and it can very well be.

So far as the harvesting of canning crops is concerned, this is no longer strictly a farmer's problem. The canners do practically everything in many cases except the planting and cultivating. They do the picking, they do the spraying, they gather the beans, and they gather the tomatoes. Some of the canning companies recruit their own help in various parts of the country. They bring them from Baltimore and other cities in large groups. They are sick and tired of these foreigners who come in here, 70 percent of whom it can be proven by the records have venereal disease.

I have a letter from one of my canners who states:

One of the labor camps was on my property for the last 3 years. During 1946 I could not see my way clear to hire any of them. I left the canning factory idle and a number of the farms practically idle for the reason that I could not produce enough of crops to pay help when they were taking two men to do one man's work. Why can't we have the names of the unemployed and strong hardy people who are on relief published in our papers so that we may know who to get in contact with when we want help?

It is universally the opinion that this foreign labor is not the kind of labor we should employ. Local labor could be recruited. For instance, one of the largest canners in the eastern part of the country located in my district rather than take any of these people went to the anthracite coal region and brought down boys and girls who, he stated, are worth twice as much as these fellows from Jamaica, Puerto Rico, and Mexico.

I have a canning company up there that states:

Commenting only for my company, the foreign agriculture-labor program was one of the least satisfactory and most expensive Government projects affecting us during the war years.

Another canner has this to say:

We had considerable experience with foreign labor as well as prisoner-of-war labor, and, therefore, can report the following as first-hand experience:

Generally speaking, the program by the Department of Agriculture was entirely negative and the only labor we secured from that Department was some Jamaicans. Up to about the beginning of 1946 the program by the USES was satisfactory and considering the labor they had available, the USES did a good job. At the beginning of 1946 we realized that we would no longer have prisoner-of-war labor, and we had been employing during each summer an average of better than 150 prisoners of war a day. We therefore had to make plans for 1946 to replace this prisoner-of-war labor. We gave careful consideration to imported labor from the Bahamas and from Jamaica. To use this labor, housing had to be erected. The labor itself had never proved very satisfactory except for the first year, which was about 1943. After that time this labor not only proved quarrelsome and expensive but very inefficient. In view of this we decided that we would spend all of our efforts toward securing local labor; and supplement local labor with the normal migratory Polish labor out of Baltimore. To this end we erected additional housing and had a very satisfactory supply of labor during 1946.

In 1947 the prospects are about as follows:

1. Sufficient male labor will be available for all jobs in this area.

2. The quality and efficiency of labor are beginning to improve.

3. Female labor is still short and will probably continue short during 1947, perhaps longer.

In talking with other canners at the recent national convention in Atlantic City the latter part of January, the above situation seems to be pretty general over the United States. Farm labor is still very scarce and unless we had purchased machinery and guaranteed to supply labor for harvest we would have had very limited acreage from 1943 on. However, canners have met this problem by recruiting labor for the farmer and by buying mechanical equipment for harvesting for the farmers' account. We believe your best source of information as to the general labor conditions on farms can be secured from canners because their problems are identical with the farmers. Considering the improving conditions, the steps which have already been taken to assist the farmer in his labor problems, and the inefficiency of the entire Department of Agriculture system for recruiting labor, we see no reason to continue this program beyond the next 30 days.

The following comments were made by growers:

My opinion is, it costs too much. If we as taxpayers want the budget lowered we must cooperate, and I sure believe it should be reduced.

Another said:

It appears now that there is plenty of help available which is caused in most cases by industrial plants being temporarily closed for lack of raw materials. In our business, which is fruit growing, there could easily be a shortage of harvest help in the event there is a bumper crop. This, of course, remains to be seen.

Another said:

Our co-op will naturally need harvest help this year. Appreciate the help we have had from existing agency. But, the war is over. Emergency spending must stop. May as well stop here first.

Another grower said:

It is time to cut out some of the hangers-on. Let men work for their living. The men that are interested in seeing this program made permanent are the camp mongers, over supervisors, etc.; men who are drawing a good salary with no work. We think it is time to quit.

This man employed 30 farm workers for a period of 85 days each.

Another comment says:

A great many of the ex-servicemen are not applying for work until their $20 a week runs out.

Another said:

Experience has taught us that persons drawing unemployment insurance will not go out into the fields and pick string beans or tomatoes, or do work in the sweet-corn fields.

This one said:

The labor supply to date is very little better than during the past years. Too much money and boondoggling by Government has them spoiled. Not until many people realize that we have a duty, as well as a privilege, will it get better.

Another states:

We have found these workers only fair—got tired after a while—could not stand prosperity. We have advised local county agent we will not need their services again.

So far as my people are concerned they take the attitude that if we want to balance the budget and cut taxes we have got to cooperate. They want to go along on this thing of saving Government money and, as I stated, the only reason I am for this pending bill is because it is going to carry us through to the end of the crop year, then period. That is what all of my people want done that have answered my questionnaires.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. FLANNAGAN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. COOLEY].

Mr. COOLEY. Mr. Chairman, I shall vote for this bill, but I shall do so very reluctantly. I think that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN] made a very sound and forceful argument, and while I favor a continuation of this program for six additional months, I think that we should now sound a warning to the farmers who have utilized this imported labor that this program will not be made permanent and they cannot look to Congress in 1948 to provide them with the expensive labor which is provided by the pending bill.

As chairman of a subcommittee of the House Committee on Agriculture I had an opportunity to investigate the labor centers which have in the past housed this migratory labor in California, Texas, Arizona, and other parts of the country.

Mr. PHILLIPS of California. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COOLEY. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. PHILLIPS of California. Does not the gentleman think that this warning should be directed to the State Department and not to the farmers, who do not want this system, and who have it imposed upon them; and does not the gentleman also think he should say that the farmers pay for this labor?

Mr. COOLEY. Of course, the farmers pay the prevailing wage, but if the farmers had to pay the cost of maintenance of the labor centers, including medical care and dental care and nursing in every form and fashion——

Mr. PHILLIPS of California. They do pay most of it. In addition, they pay a stand-by charge when labor is not employed.

Mr. COOLEY. If the farmer is paying the cost of it, why do we have this bill pending in Congress?

Mr. PHILLIPS of California. Because the State Department has a contract with the Government of Mexico. That is the only way in which that labor is permitted to work in the United States.

Mr. COOLEY. In other words, the Federal Government pays the cost.

Mr. PHILLIPS of California. The Federal Government pays the cost of administration.

Mr. COOLEY. I will ask my friend the gentleman from California if it is not a fact that foreign labor was imported into California to help in agriculture long before we ever had a Federal labor program?

Mr. PHILLIPS of California. That is correct.

Mr. COOLEY. And the farmers then paid the cost of it.

Mr. PHILLIPS of California. That is correct.

Mr. COOLEY. While during the war the Federal Government has borne the enormous cost of maintaining these labor centers and transporting labor.

Mr. PHILLIPS of California. They paid the railroad charges up and back.

Mr. COOLEY. And they paid the medical charge and dental care, and other costs.

Mr. PHILLIPS of California. The farmer paid a great deal of that and paid the cost when labor did not work. The farmer also paid for not working.

Mr. COOLEY. If the gentleman will look at the estimates on the desk before him, he will find that there is an item contained therein for medical care and dental care.

Mr. PHILLIPS of California. That is supervisory.

Mr. COOLEY. And these workers not only bring in themselves, but their families, and they have babies, and we provide medical care and attention for them.

Mr. PHILLIPS of California. We do that anyway near the line.

Mr. COOLEY. You do what?

Mr. PHILLIPS of California. Near the line, the Mexican line, we do that anyway.

Mr. COOLEY. Another thing is the fact that in providing this labor, somebody in a responsible position went not to the Mexican border, but went 800 miles south of Mexico City to recruit the labor.

Mr PHILLIPS of California. That was required by the Mexican Government. That is the point I am trying to make.

Mr. COOLEY. That is it; so they get a nice junket, a nice ride from 800 miles south of Mexico City to the city of Portland, Oreg., or some other far-distant point. That is an expensive program, there is no doubt about it. It may be needed, and I am voting for it this time, because I am willing to follow my committee in the belief that it is needed. But, are we faced with a situation that American labor is unwilling to till the fields of America and to cultivate the crops of America? If so, we better appoint a committee now to start preparing for a permanent labor program for the future.

I know that this is a burden that should be borne by the farmers themselves, or certainly by the States and the localities, and I believe that these labor centers, which have been objectionable in many of the localities, and tremendously expensive, should be taken over. It would be a good act on the part of Congress if we would give them away, give them to the States and let the States maintain them, because migratory labor is not a problem in all of the States of the Union.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from North Carolina has expired.

Mr. FLANNAGAN. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman two additional minutes.

Mr. HOLIFIELD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COOLEY. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. HOLIFIELD. In regard to this State Department argument that my friend from California has just raised, may I say that in order to get Mexican labor out of Mexico during the war the former Mexican Government insisted that they be brought in under certain contractual safeguards, with certain minimum wages and certain types of buildings that were to be furnished for them to live in while they were here.

Mr. COOLEY. And certain types of food had to be furnished.

Mr. HOLIFIELD. The thing the gentleman from California is objecting to is that the private employers of labor are not allowed to go into Mexico and recruit them without any regard to minimum wages or their living conditions here.

Mr. PHILLIPS of California. No; that is not a correct statement.

Mr. HOLIFIELD. That course was followed before the contractual agreements were entered into.

Mr. COOLEY. I should like to use a little of my time myself. One other reason I am for this bill is this: To date landlords throughout the country have not been able to obtain the necessary building materials to provide housing facilities for migratory labor. Within the next 6 months, or certainly within the next 12 months, the landlords of America should be ready, able, and willing to provide at least temporary quarters to house migratory labor. Otherwise they ought not to expect the Federal Government to dig down into the taxpayers' pockets to support the centers such as we have seen throughout the country. They are numerous and they are expensive. People ride into labor camps, park their cars, and move into quarters and take possession; and, according to our investigation, they were unwilling even to cut the weeds away from their front door, and when they did cut the weeds or grass around their little cottages, they had to be paid for it out of the taxpayers' money. I think the time has come to stop it, and I hope it will be stopped at the end of this year.

It seems to me that States in which migratory labor is a problem would welcome an opportunity to take over and to operate the labor camps and other facilities used in connection therewith, and to finance and maintain them. It also occurs to me that landowners engaged in cultivating large acreages, or even specialty crops, should be willing to provide housing facilities and other necessities for migratory labor which is so necessary in the harvesting season. Before shelters and camps were provided these laborers slept and lived out in the open, on ditch banks and in other places. Wherever it is possible landlords should provide all-year employment for a sufficient number of laborers to enable them to harvest their crops. This situation of American families traveling from one end of the country to the other, following the harvest seasons, should not longer be tolerated. It is a problem of great magnitude and one which should arouse the people of the communities and States in which it prevails. Foreign labor should not be imported except in the days of great emergency. The people of America should be encouraged to till the fields of America and to harvest the crops of their country. Certainly, no American will be encouraged to work in the fields if shelter and the bare necessities of life are not provided.

The attention of the Nation has been focused upon the desperate and distressing situation which has heretofore existed. May we hope that within the next year the people and the communities which have a great and personal financial interest in the crops to be harvested will get busy and do something about it, and thereby make it possible for the Federal Government to withdraw completely from activity in this field.

Mr. HOPE. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. JOHNSON].

Mr. JOHNSON of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I believe that no man in this House, with the possible exception of the gentlemen from Ohio [Mr. CLEVENGER, Mr. SMITH, and Mr. JONES], have better voting records than I in the matter of doing away with useless expenditures, but I am supporting this bill because I think it is very necessary. It will not entail the expenditure of a tremendous amount of money.

Many of you who come from the Middle West have in the last couple of months received many letters like those I have received, telling me the writers had first-hand information, or they could prove, that great warehouses out in the Midwest were jam-packed full of sugar, while they could not get any sugar. They asked why the sugar was not distributed so the consumers, so the housewives, could get it. You looked into the matter just as I did and you found that that sugar was beet sugar which had just been processed, and that there will be no more beet sugar harvested or processed until next fall. That beet sugar has to be spread out so as to last us until the new crop comes in. We need sugar mighty bad, and everybody knows that, but I warn you that unless we make available this extra labor that is needed to produce beet sugar we are going to have an awfully short crop of beet sugar this fall. At the time when we look forward to getting plenty of sugar we will find the cupboard bare, and we will be no better off than we are today unless we do something about this matter and pass this legislation.

Mr. GAVIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Illinois. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. GAVIN. I wonder if the distinguished gentleman can tell us approximately what it will cost to carry on and wind up this program in December 1947? What will be the over-all cost, approximately?

Mr. JOHNSON of Illinois. I cannot tell the gentleman that because nobody knows. They are beginning to get their applications in now. The operators of many of the canning factories throughout the Midwest tell me that many of them that had some of this labor before do not expect to use any of it this year, but there are places where they are absolutely dependent upon it, in the far West, and this is true particularly of the sugar and the canning factories.

Mr. COOLEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Illinois. I yield to the gentleman from North Carolina.

Mr. COOLEY. The gentleman was a member of the committee that investigated the labor centers throughout the country. Does not the gentleman feel that at some time in the very near future the Federal Government should withdraw all of its support from the maintenance of these labor camps and centers throughout the country?

Mr. JOHNSON of Illinois. They should do it, and if we give them this extension, they should have it done at that time.

Mr. COOLEY. That is, at the end of this year.

Mr. JOHNSON of Illinois. It will give an opportunity to these growers who want to buy these housing units and use them.

Mr. HOPE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Illinois. I yield.

Mr. HOPE. If we pass this bill, they will do it at the end of that time.

Mr. JOHNSON of Illinois. That is right.

Mr. GAVIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Illinois. I yield briefly.

Mr. GAVIN. May I ask the chairman of the committee if he can give us an estimate of the approximate cost of the job?

Mr. HOPE. A short time ago, when the chairman had the floor, he stated estimates from the Department of Agriculture showed that it would probably cost about $10,000,000 to continue the program for an additional 6 months.

Mr. GAVIN. That will wind it up?

Mr. HOPE. That will wind it up.

Mr. JOHNSON of Illinois. May I add that this bill says it shall be liquidated and that is the purpose of this bill—to liquidate the program within this period. These canners are all dependent on peas, corn, and tomatoes, and if you know anything about it you would realize what these people are up against. Was it the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN] awhile ago who said we are getting into an era—I do not know if those are his exact words—of unwillingness to work. We can lay that to the fault of this Congress if a great number of people would rather go along not working, for a smaller allowance, than work for a salary. These canneries are going to need those products, and we are going to need the canned vegetables. I know something about that. They have to know something about it pretty quickly if they are going to get the crops in so that we will have enough corn, tomatoes, peas, and so forth. I was a grower of vegetables myself. I used to grow 20 acres of tomatoes right near Peoria, in the district of the gentleman from Illinois. The 20 acres of tomatoes were sold to a canning factory. We would have a contract by this time and the canning factory would agree to take all that we would produce, all at a stipulated price. The seed would be going into the ground now in that section of the country, that is, in hot beds, and they would be getting ready to transplant the seedlings to the fields. I am sure there will be little of that labor needed in central Illinois, but I do know in the far West and in California, where they do not have 20-acre plots, but have hundreds and thousands of acres, it will be necessary.

Mr. FLANNAGAN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Utah [Mr. GRANGER].

Mr. GRANGER. Mr. Chairman, I do not know that there was anyone more opposed to this proposal to extend authority to recruit farm labor outside the continental United States when it was brought before the committee than I was. I am only voting for the continuation of this legislation after listening to the pleas of farm organizations and others who have convinced me that it was necessary. The committee is aware of the objections to this legislation. I think the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN] expressed the view of nearly every member of the committee. But after listening to the farmers and those interested in this matter, we concluded and voted unanimously to continue this legislation for another 6 months. Then the legislation would be discontinued. As I said earlier, you are going to have this program in any event until midyear, that is, right in the middle of the crop year. Perhaps it would be more necessary to have this labor during the harvest than to have it during the planting time. For those reasons I am convinced that we should pass this legislation.

It has been observed that the State Department caused some of these contracts to be made. It must be recognized that the State Department makes a contract with another country.

I would have very little regard for the Republic of Mexico if they did not make some requirements of this country and not allow this country to go down there and indiscriminately take nationals from their country and not guarantee to give them some protection.

Mr. HOLIFIELD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GRANGER. I yield.

Mr. HOLIFIELD. Is it not also true that the farm organizations came before the State Department and advocated that they make such an agreement because they knew that was the only way they could get the labor out of Mexico?

Mr. GRANGER. Certainly.

Mr. HOLIFIELD. And to attack the State Department is entirely unwarranted?

Mr. GRANGER. I think so, too. I do not subscribe to the statements that were made about it.

Furthermore, there seems to be much said about New Deal legislation. I am a farmer who went broke during those glorious days when we did not have New Deal legislation. I want to say the only decent legislation that has ever helped the farmer has been New Deal legislation.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Utah has expired.

Mr. FLANNAGAN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. SADOWSKI].

Mr. SADOWSKI. Mr. Chairman, I do not have a farmer in my district, but I have got a lot of labor and a lot of consumers of food. I think this bill means more food at cheaper prices, and I am going to vote for it.

I saw the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary in the Chamber a few minutes ago. I want to bring this letter to the attention of the House. It is signed by the chairman of the committee, and it states:

> DEAR MR. ATTORNEY GENERAL: During each session of the Congress the Government is put to a great deal of embarrassment and expense through the introduction of private bills relating to immigration and naturalization.
> The committee is aware that in many cases your Department stays deportation proceedings and is otherwise harassed because of the mere introduction of these bills. We feel this situation is in need of correction.
> Accordingly, unless the committee addresses some formal communication to you after the introduction of any such bill or bills, you may feel free to disregard the practice of staying deportation proceedings.
> This letter is written pursuant to a resolution passed by the House Judiciary Committee at a session this morning and is not a letter of the chairman but is the letter of the committee.

Now, since when has the Judiciary Committee usurped that authority? What sort of meat do they feed on that they have become so great? Does the average Member of the House have no standing any more? Have some of these people gone power-mad because they have been out of power for 14 years? The chairman of my Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. WOLVERTON] permits every Member to come over there. He has invited them to come and appear on their bills. That is how fair we are. But here is a committee that does not invite you to appear on your bill, it does not give you an opportunity, but sends a letter to the Department telling them, in effect, "You go ahead and deport a man" when you have a bill to stay proceedings, and it is a hardship case. I want to ask the Speaker of the House if he authorized this action, and, if he did, I am going to appeal to the President of the United States to tell the Attorney General not to permit any such action.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. SADOWSKI] has expired.

Mr. FLANNAGAN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. ELLIOTT.].

Mr. ELLIOTT. Mr. Chairman, I have always been opposed to foreign labor if it was at all possible to harvest the crops without it. The farmers do not wish to have farm laborers imported to harvest their crops. I can remember many years ago when we brought foreigners from various countries, but since that time rules and regulations have forbidden the individual farmer to make a deal for himself. Conditions have changed today. The farmer is called upon to provide housing for farm laborers different from that provided many years ago. For that reason the farmer in the past has not been able to obtain sufficient material to provide decent quarters for the average farmer and his family to live in. Mexican nationals can be brought in and housed in quarters where 150 or 200 single men can be kept together. You cannot do that with American labor. The cost of harvesting various types of fruit with foreign labor is from $3.50 to $6 a ton more than when harvested by our own American laborers.

This is not the big landowners' problem as some have said here today. Many small farmers, during the war period and at the present time, would be unable to harvest their crops if sufficient labor were not supplied from some other source. Farm-labor camps and labor camps with foreign laborers make it possible for the small farmer to call at the camp and transport to and from his farm the number of men needed to harvest his crops. Our American laborers are just not available to work on the farms. It is impossible in my section to have the cotton picked in the fall of the year without some outside help, as it cannot be obtained locally. And in the peak of the fruit season when you have on hot days—and I wish to mention that the temperature might run from 102 to 110—you have millions of tons of fruit in my State to be harvested in a period of 10 days to 2 weeks' time, depending on the type of crop. You must make arrangements in advance. We know that the labor must be brought in to be there at the time that crop is going to ripen.

I can say to you most sincerely that it is not the wish of the farmers to bring in Mexican nationals, but they are forced to. They wish the people of this country would raise their boys to want to be farmers and go out on the farms. That is what I would like to see happen today. Instead of that we see young men leaving the farms when they grow up. The modern young man does not want to go out and work the long hours one has to work on the farm to make a living. So our farmers who are using this foreign labor are doing something they do not want to do. Some say that what the big farmer wants is cheap labor. That is not the case. It costs more to use that kind of labor than it does to work our own American laborers. I have employed some of them of different nationalities. I have employed Jananese, Chinese, Mexicans, Hindus, and people of practically every race there is, but they do not seem to get the job done like our own American boys. So certainly it is not cheap labor; it is most expensive labor.

Mr. COOLEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ELLIOTT. I yield.

Mr. COOLEY. Does not the gentleman feel that after all it is a problem of the States and localities rather than of the Federal Government to provide for the importation, support, and maintenance of these people while they are here?

Mr. ELLIOTT. I will agree with the gentleman that perhaps it is the duty of the State and in some instances of the communities to provide this labor, but with the labor supply taken away from us like it has been and with our being refused materials to provide homes how can we attract American labor? We today are not doing our duty to see that material is made available to the farmers with which they can provide homes on their farms. You cannot criticize the young man for not wanting to take his wife on a farm and expect her to live in a tent, yet that is the way a lot of this labor has to live.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from California has expired.

Mr. HOPE. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. HILL].

Mr. HILL. Mr. Chairman, it would be impossible to discuss a question like this is 5 minutes, but I would like to mention some angles I think Members who have spoken failed to consider. First of all, the war itself and its direct effect on farm labor was absolutely terrific in my section. They took our farm boys and they still were taking them last September. And then you tell me the war is over and the effect on agricultural products in my territory is not being felt. We are still living under war-time conditions in many sections of Colorado.

Let me call attention to another thing. We do not live close to these great centers where you can get help on a moment's notice from the ranks of the unemployed. We have to bring them a long, long ways, and we cannot get the help in when we need it unless we have some type of organization to bring it in.

Let me say that this war not only took our farm boys but it came into our territory, and renters and even farm owners quit the farms and moved into the large industrial centers, where they felt they could make more money in 6 months or a year than they could in a lifetime on a farm.

Here is another thing. We could not help it. No one is to blame. Neither the Democratic Party nor the Republican Party. No one is to blame. These are conditions over which man has no power. But let us analyze another element. Someone mentioned farm implements. Let me say that we could not even buy farm implement repairs, and they are scarce even today. I heard someone here say: "Let us look at this great volume of farm implements in relation to the amount of money you spend for farm implements." That does not mean a thing unless you manufacture the small equipment that is necessary for the average farm. The farm implements are not here and the supply will not be on hand in 1947; do not forget that; so it is not only manpower these farms need, it is machinery. If you will give us in the beet industry 5 to 7 years we will have it completely mechanized. We are working toward that end.

This bill does not concern itself with the remarks that were made by two gentlemen on the floor of this House. This bill concerns temporary help—not permanent. These men come in quickly, as the gentleman from California who just preceded me told you. He could just as well have said, too, that unless that help comes in immediately, unless that help is there when the crop is ready, it is absolutely a complete and total loss in many cases. I direct your attention to green beans, where a few days will make it impossible for those green beans to be canned. The same applies to many of the other vegetables, such as red beets, sweet corn, tomatoes, and a whole list of vegetables.

We heard testimony that if he could not get help when the vegetables were ready to pick and bring them into the cannery, the whole community would have to change their farm operations.

I am surprised that some of you gentlemen oppose this legislation. Let us see who is for the legislation. The best processors appeared and gave their testimony. There was a whole list of them that I put in the record. The beet farmer himself says he must have this type of legislation. He needs it for the coming 6 months. Then we can drop the whole program at the end of that time. We do not want any outside help if we can find our own labor within the Nation. The canning industry appeared and gave us some real testimony as to why we need this temporary foreign labor. The Department of Agriculture appeared before us in support of this legislation. Regardless of what a gentleman said to you previously, I tell you that the county agricultural agent knows where these men are needed, and if the great State of Pennsylvania has the kind of county agents that the gentleman says they have up there, it is about time that the great State of Pennsylvania fire some of their county agents and come out to California, Colorado, or Wyoming, some of our Western States, and get men who know how to handle a county agent's job. There is not a county agent in our State who does not know when his farmers need extra help.

In closing let me say that the farm organizations appeared before us, and they are for this temporary legislation.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Colorado has expired.

Mr. HOPE. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman one additional minute.

Mr. GROSS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HILL. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. GROSS. I want to make the observation that while a county agent may not know what he wants, the farmers do.

Mr. HILL. The county agent knows what the farmers want because the farmers have confidence in him and approve of his program.

Mr. GAVIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HILL. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. GAVIN. If the program is as good as the gentleman has outlined it to us, why does the committee recommend that it be terminated in December 1947?

Mr. HILL. No one said this is a good program. We say this is a temporary program, as I told the committee a minute ago that this is a temporary program and applies to temporary help only.

Mr. FLANNAGAN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 4 minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. LEA].

Mr. LEA. Mr. Chairman, I see no reason to read any political question into this problem. From the beginning of this particular program, it has always been brought to the House from the Committee on Agriculture practically by unanimous consent. Today I commend the committee for what it has done in bringing this legislation to the House. I justify this program not for any theoretical reasons but for very practical ones. The beginning of it and the continuation of it are justified on the basis of necessity, and not otherwise. Those who today draw a picture of the farmers of the country wanting this program in order to get cheap labor are presenting a picture not faithful to the facts. That is not the motive behind this legislation.

As indicated by one or two previous speakers, it is decidedly more expensive for the farmers to use this foreign labor than it is the domestic supply. They would like to get rid of the program as soon as other taxpayers of the country.

But I have seen the operation of this program in our State. Much of the production in California of food products, vegetables as well as fruits, is upon a wholesale mass production basis. Last year California produced the largest canned crop of both vegetables and fruits that was ever produced. Those products are needed by this country and by the countries that we are trying to aid in the distressed situation of the world. I can say to you as a practical fact that a substantial part of that production of fruits and vegetables would never have gone to the canners if it had not been for this means of providing labor to assist the American farmer who produced it. It is literally true that millions of dollars' worth of such foods in the past 3 years has been produced with the help of this imported labor. Again, I want to emphasize the fact that it is costing the farmers more than domestic labor. There is still a definite prospect that there is not going to be an adequate supply of domestic labor this year.

Within the last week the Governor of California was here and it has been revealed that California today has more labor employment than it had in the peak of war production. Now, with that situation before us the consumers of the country must realize that, if this program is not continued, they are likely going to have a less supply of the necessary food products in this country for the coming year.

Mr. FLANNAGAN. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may desire to the gentleman from Montana [Mr. MANSFIELD].

Mr. MANSFIELD of Montana. Mr. Chairman, I am, indeed, surprised at the opposition to this bill to provide needed farm labor for the West. Believe me, I would not be here fighting for the passage of this measure if it was not vitally needed.

I have heard many cries of distress because we do not have enough sugar. Yet if you defeat this bill, you will take away from the beet growers in my State of Montana the only means by which they can harvest this very needed crop.

When I plead for this legislation I do so on the basis of my unhappy experiences over the past 4 years in getting labor for the sugar-beet fields of Montana. My farmers do not want a continuation of this type of labor any longer than necessary, but they do want this labor until a permanent farm-labor program is inaugurated and until they can mechanize their fields as much as possible.

My only thought is that this legislation is needed now to give assurance to our sugar-beet farmers so that they can have some assurance for the crop year ahead.

Mr. HOPE. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may desire to the gentleman from Washington [Mr. HORAN].

Mr. HORAN. Mr. Chairman, this legislation merely extends this beneficial program to the end of the calendar year and corrects the difficulty so often encountered with our appropriations by fiscal years. These end, of course, on June 30, the very middle of the crop season.

It is also worthy of note that, since the program is already lined up and commitments made, only a small percentage of savings would be made.

Mr. FLANNAGAN. Mr. Chairman, I have no further requests for time.

Mr. HOPE. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may desire to the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. MILLER].

Mr. MILLER of Maryland. Mr. Chairman, my district is the Eastern Shore of Maryland. It has been said that our section is allergic to foreigners—that we are self-sufficient and look upon strangers with suspicion. Be that as it may, the laborers that have been imported under the Farm Labor Supply Appropriation Act may not have been the most desirable class of laborers, and it may well be that we would like to be able to do without them, but for this coming crop season they are an unpleasant necessity.

My district is in many ways a huge food factory. The farmers, packers, and watermen produce a huge quantity of fine food: fresh, frozen, and canned vegetables, fruits, and seafoods, and our bottleneck comes at the time that this food must be harvested or packed and preserved for the market.

I sincerely hope that a sound plan of providing necessary labor to take care of the peak loads may be worked out in future years so that, with adequate machinery, local labor—or at least American labor—will be sufficient to meet our needs. It would, however, be a calamity if we were unable to save our crops and supply the hungry mouths of the world this particular year. The bill under consideration, if passed, will not change the situation in the midst of a crop year and at the same time it serves notice that the present plan will be liquidated by the end of 1947.

For these reasons, I urge the passage of the bill.

Mr. HOPE. Mr. Chairman, I yield the remainder of the time on this side to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. MURRAY].

Mr. MURRAY of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, I did not know until this bill got on the floor that it was a political question. I know that, as far as my own side was concerned, nearly every Member was opposed to the bill in the form in which it first appeared in the committee. However, most of us have to change our positions some and make agreements to work for the common good. There is not any question but what sugar production in 1947 and canned vegetables for 1947 are dependent on this legislation. California and the sugar-beet areas of the West are very dependent on this legislation.

This legislation was considered very carefully in the committee. The situation just brought out by our distinguished colleague, the gentleman from California [Mr. LEA], was presented. When we realize that the State of California produces about 20 percent of the vegetables in the United States and has to put them into cans, then I think we begin to appreciate what the problem is.

We have a timetable on this program now, which we did not have when it came into the committee. This whole business is over with on January 1. I want it to appear in the RECORD at this point that should it happen to have a bad reception in some other body and it comes back here with anything on it beyond January 1, 1948, I do not want to be a party to it. I can assure every person here that we have tried to bring this in as a compromise.

It was brought out this morning that the Government is spending five or six billion dollars renegotiating with the business firms of this country after the war. How much money we are going to spend, whether three, four, five, up to ten million dollars, to renegotiate the farm-labor problem, is for you to judge and decide.

We have plenty of confidence that our distinguished colleague, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN], with his eagle eye, will not let any money be wasted on this program this year, but we trust that he will have an approach that will not deny the needed labor to any group. If we are going to follow anywhere near the food commitments that are being made, and perhaps being made rather loosely, to the peoples of this world, that we are going to feed them, I guess it would be pretty good public policy to go along with this labor program at least until January 1, 1948.

While I have always felt that if these additional funds were given to American workmen sufficient domestic labor could be secured, I am willing to go along with the distinct understanding that the program terminates January 1, 1948. I mean January 1, 1948.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin has expired. All time has expired.

The Clerk will read the bill for amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the farm-labor supply program conducted pursuant to the Farm Labor Supply Appropriation Act, 1944 (Public Law 229, 78th Cong., 2d sess., title I), as amended and supplemented, including the exemptions relating to the admission of farm laborers authorized by section 5 (g) of such act, may be continued for a period not to exceed 6 months after June 30, 1947: Provided, That such program shall be liquidated by December 31, 1947. In order to continue to make available for the purposes of this program all labor-supply centers, labor homes, labor camps, and facilities heretofore available in this program, section 2 (d) of the Farmers' Home Administration Act of 1946 (Public Law 731, 79th Cong., 2d sess.) is hereby amended by deleting therefrom the following language: "or until 6 months after the termination of the present hostilities as determined by concurrent resolution of the Congress or by the President, whichever is the earlier" and inserting in lieu thereof the following language: "or December 31, 1947, whichever is the earlier." Such amounts as may be necessary for the continuance and liquidation of such program as provided in this act are hereby authorized to be appropriated.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Chairman, I offer a preferential motion.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. DIRKSEN moves that the Committee do now rise and report the bill back to the House with the recommendation that the enacting clause be stricken out.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Chairman, may I assure the members of the committee that I find no particular felicity in the position that I feel constrained to take upon this and upon certain other legislation, but let me admonish you now that it is only a few days ago that this House by a resounding action imposed a ceiling on expenditures $6,000,000,000 below the President's budget, which was subsequently reduced to $4,500,000,000 by another body. In the middle of this week the conferees from both bodies will meet to join the issue. It is not an easy job, I assure you gentlemen, to find $6,000,000,000, but I think we can do it. But when you add to that burden the job of finding money for this expenditure, and perhaps others, I assure you it becomes an immeasurably more difficult task. Only a few days ago a measure passed this House to provide a program with respect to the hoof-and-mouth disease at an estimated cost of $60,000,000. My own estimate of what this will cost is at least $15,000,000. The maximum in other years was about $26,000,000.

The Committee on Appropriations, of which I have the honor to be a member, has thus far appropriated $113,000,000 for this purpose since fiscal 1944. So, remember, there is a ceiling, and it is the responsibility of every individual to carefully scrutinize every bill which seeks to appropriate or authorize the appropriation of money.

There is no estimate for this in the President's budget. Examine the budget when you get back to your offices, and you will find that the last estimate was for the fiscal year 1947. What is proposed here today is the lifting of the budget of the President of the United States after we made a determined effort here 2 weeks ago to impose a ceiling on expenditures. Does the action then taken have no significance for us now?

The question was raised here of breaking faith with the farmers. It was raised by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. ZIMMERMAN]. The law is just as plain as print can be that the cut-off date for this law was June 30, 1947. There is no breaking faith with the farmers. The farm organizations and their legislative representatives know that the program was to end in June. They know what it means when an act says it shall end on June 30, 1947. That is what we said to the farmers last year. So, where is the element of lack of faith or betrayal involved on the part of Congress?

They say this is a short program of 6 months to provide for liquidation. Is it going to be a liquidation program? Here is a letter from the Farm Bureau Federation addressed to a Senator from Illinois. It was written on the 19th of February 1947. With respect to this bill, it says:

Yes; we favor a 6-month extension for this purpose, with a provision for 90-day liquidation of the farm workers' program after that date.

And, further:

We are also working on a permanent farm-labor program to be carried out through the extension service.

This bill must go to another body. They will have a whack at it. It will come back here after a conference and thus may well become the springboard for a permanent program that will cost the people millions of dollars from here on out.

Gentlemen, do not be disillusioned, deceived, or dismayed by the representation that it is necessarily a temporary sort of business because I have been through that mill before. I aided in ending farm crop insurance here on this floor once—and I say it with all modesty—but the whole program was written back into the appropriation bill over in the other body. Today, it is in effect, and the losses through indemnities on some items are greater than they ever were. Make no mistake about it. Now then, here is a preferential motion to test the sentiment of the committee. Do you want it or do you not? But, remember, permanency is lurking right around the corner.

Mr. HOPE. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the motion of the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. Chairman, this bill is to liquidate the farm-labor program. The gentleman from Illinois can be assured, and I know I am speaking for those who will be on the conference committee, that if there are amendments adopted in the Senate, changing this to a permanent program, the conferees on the part of the House will not agree to them in conference. We intend to keep this as a liquidation bill, and I know of no disposition in the other body to modify this bill by setting up a permanent program.

There is such a thing as being penny wise and pound foolish. This bill is going to cost a little money. The Department of Agriculture says $10,000,000. The distinguished gentleman from Illinois, of course, as the chairman of the Subcommittee on Agricultural Appropriations is going to be the man who will determine how much it will cost. We all have enough confidence in him to know there is not going to be any money wasted on this program.

Now let me call your attention to some of the testimony before the committee as to just how necessary and important this program is. Here is a paragraph from a letter from the Minnesota Canners' Association. Minnesota is one of the largest of our canning-crop States. It reads as follows:

As an illustration, in Minnesota alone in 1946, 90 percent of the sweet corn, 70 percent of the peas, and 90 percent of the other canning crops were harvested by this imported labor.

Then it goes on to say that unless this labor is available this year their operation cannot be carried out. They cannot make contracts with their producers. They say the need is as great this year as it was last year.

Let me read to you from the testimony of Josiah Ferris, representing the United States Sugar Corp., of Clewiston, Fla. He says:

If we are unable to continue the use of the foreign labor we now have in our employ, approximately 3,000 Jamaicans and Barbadians, we will be unable to harvest and process our 1947–48 crop, which will mean in sugar to the housewives of America a loss of about 200,000,000 pounds.

Let me call attention to the statement of Colonel Buie, who is director of foreign labor program in the Department of Agriculture. He says:

We worked 22,000 Mexicans in the great sugar beet harvest last fall. In other words, 22,000 Mexicans harvested 35 percent of the sugar beets, representing approximately $130,000,000.

Every Member of this House has had letters from housewives wanting to know when they are going to get more sugar. If we refuse to pass this legislation out of a sense of false economy, what are you going to tell them when they write to you next year? Are you going to say, "We did not have the foresight a year ago to provide the farmers with enough labor to plant and harvest the sugar beet crop, so we are short"? Yet, I am sure that there is no one, after hearing the discussion on this floor today, who is not convinced that it is absolutely necessary to have this legislation if we are going to produce the sugar that we need in this country, or if we are going to have the canned fruits and vegetables that we need if we are going to feed our people.

I hope the committee will vote down the motion offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN] by an overwhelming majority.

The CHAIRMAN. The question recurs on the preferential motion of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN].

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. DIRKSEN) there were—ayes 32, noes 105.

So the motion was rejected.

Mr. CLEVENGER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, as a member of the Committee on Agriculture, I merely rise, as our old friend from New York used to say, in the interest of the record.

We are working at the present moment on an extension. Had we not had one 6 months' extension this thing would have been all wrapped up in mothballs and forgotten on the 31st day of last December. Last spring, when this measure was due to expire in December, representation was made to us that it would be necessary to get all of these aliens out of the country by the 31st of December and that they might be taken out of the beet fields right in the middle of the harvesting season. I was a member of the committee that went down to consult with the Secretary of Agriculture and others about it. We went down asking him for an extension to give them time to assure that the beet crop would be harvested. Somewhat against my own impulses and only in the interest of being assured that the beet crop would be taken in I went along and was a member of this party. So this thing was continued until June 30. I was for March 1 but my views did not prevail. We are now here with an extension on an extension to make this thing live through the calendar year 1947.

I shall perhaps vote for this bill. Out in my country we raise some tomatoes. They may be vegetables in some of your districts but up in northern and western Ohio where we raise them they are fruit. Some of you may have seen a ton of tomatoes. A ton of tomatoes is a lot of tomatoes, and a thousand tons of tomatoes is a lot of tomatoes. Well, they raised 125,000 tons in my district last year.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CLEVENGER. I yield.

Mr. McCORMACK. Coming from a city district it seems to me that the proponents of this bill in the emergency that exists have made out a clear case justifying it not only for the farmer but also in the interest of the country, the consumer as well.

Mr. CLEVENGER. I may say to the gentleman from Massachusetts that I am coming to that right now. As I said before, 125,000 tons of tomatoes is a lot of tomatoes; and the sugar beets are there also, and we have feather-bedded employment—there is no question about it. Until we get tough enough to do as old John Smith did down in the James River peninsula when some of the gentlemen at Jamestown said that their hands were not toughened to the ax, they were informed that if they did not chop they would not eat——

Mr. HOPE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CLEVENGER. I yield.

Mr. HOPE. Does not the gentleman believe we have pretty well taken care of that situation by the amendment in section 2 of this bill?

Mr. CLEVENGER. I think so; and I am voting for this bill only with the assurance from my chairman that this thing is dead and is going to be embalmed and buried.

Mr. Chairman, I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. BUSBEY. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the pro forma amendment.

Mr. Chairman, the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Agriculture, the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. HOPE], just read from the testimony of Mr. Ferris, vice president of the United States Sugar Corp., that they would not be able to continue their program unless they could have the benefit of the 3,000 Jamaicans and Barbadians they employ on their plantation at Clewiston, Fla. There is an old saying: We should put the oil where the squeak is. A few years ago I had the opportunity and pleasure of going over this entire sugar plantation at Clewiston. They have a development there so large that they had to bring in thousands of Negroes and build many villages on the plantation for them.

One of the conditions that surrounds this whole problem is due to what happened right on that big plantation. A few years ago the New Deal administration said to the United States Sugar Corp. at Clewiston, Fla.: "You will have to cut down the acreage you have under cultivation by over half." What did that do? It threw thousands and thousands of these colored employees out of work and they immediately went on the dole. Then when the sugar situation got acute and they wanted these colored people to go back to work on this plantation, they refused to do so. They would not go back to work. This is one of the reasons they have had to resort to the importation of foreign labor.

Mr. Chairman, this is as good a time as any to start redeeming our campaign pledge to cut down Government expenditures, and particularly subsidies. This is a double subsidy bill. It is a subsidy on the program provided in the bill, and it is a subsidy on people drawing unemployment compensation who are not willing to work.

It has been stated that this is a temporary bill. It extends subsidies 6 months. If we do not extend it 6 months, subsidies die on June 30 of this year. If you do extend it 6 months, this is going to give the crowd who wants subsidies 6 months longer to drum up a permanent proposition. There is not a thing in the world to prevent them from coming to the floor of this House at the beginning of the second session of the Congress and introducing legislation identical to this. How can anyone say it is temporary? It is time to start reducing Government expenditures and redeeming our campaign pledges. This is an excellent place to start.

Mr. HOPE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUSBEY. I yield to the gentleman from Kansas.

Mr. HOPE. If we vote this bill down today, there is nothing to keep anyone from introducing the same bill in the second session of the Congress, is there?

Mr. BUSBEY. It gives them 6 months longer to cook up another bill.

Mr. HOPE. They will have the same 6 months whether we kill it or pass it.

Mr. BUSBEY. If we are going to start cutting, we better start now. Day after day you are going to have bill after bill come in here that a special group will want passed. If you were sincere last fall during the campaign, when you promised the people you were going to cut expenditures, you will vote against this resolution.

Mr. GAVIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUSBEY. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. GAVIN. I wonder what the corporation to which the gentleman refers is going to do next year. Does the gentleman have anything to suggest as to what position they will be in?

Mr. BUSBEY. What did they do before they imported this labor?

Mr. GAVIN. Evidently they got along all right.

Mr. BUSBEY. If the people who originally worked this plantation are not willing to go back there and work, while we have 2,000,000 unemployed in this country, and we have to subsidize imported labor, the people of this country should be told the truth about it.

The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN] estimates this extension will cost approximately $15,000,000. The people of this country are demanding a cut in income taxes. It will be difficult to give it to them if we pass resolutions like this one, especially when it is not even asked for in the President's budget.

It is time we stop playing politics and vote our convictions.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. D'EWART. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last four words.

Mr. Chairman, this is important legislation not only to the agriculture of my State but to the sugar consumers of the whole country. In 1945 we produced 871,000 tons of sugar in Montana. Last year we produced about 1,000,000 tons.

If this bill is passed today it will encourage the beet growers of my State to produce another million tons of sugar for use in this country. In order to produce a million tons of sugar last year, we had last spring some 4,000 prisoners of war and some 2,500 Mexican nationals.

Those prisoners left about July 1. In the fall of the year we had between 3,000 and 3,500 Mexicans to harvest that crop.

We only harvested the crop with the greatest of handicaps due to early fall snow and other difficulties. Those beet growers were very discouraged before that crop was finally harvested. Now, if we do not give them some assurance of a labor supply to harvest this year's crop they are not going to grow that millon tons, and it will be a serious thing to the whole country.

Mr. JENNINGS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. D'EWART. I yield to the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. JENNINGS. Have you any other source of labor to enable your people to grow this million tons of beet sugar this year?

Mr. D'EWART. We do not have sufficient labor in our State.

Mr. JENNINGS. Then you are dependent upon the passage of this bill to get it.

Mr. D'EWART. We have to have the assurance of this labor if we are going to grow that million tons.

Mr. COLE of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. D'EWART. I yield to the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. COLE of Missouri. Would the gentleman be able to say the same thing about 1948, 1949, and 1950?

Mr. D'EWART. We sincerely hope not. We hope to mechanize that crop out there so that we can produce it by machinery.

I have here a letter that I would like to quote from very briefly from a processor in my State which throws some light on this situation:

Nearly everyone I contact in this particular district is asking when they can expect more sugar to be granted the household user as well as the commercial user.

The feeling regarding sugar beet growing in 1947 is quite good at the present time. As yet we do not have a contract to present the growers. However, I anticipate signing a good acreage for this factory this year. The question in the minds of nearly all of the growers is the one we have had in past years, "What about the labor situation?" I learn now that the permanent labor program has been sidetracked for the time being and that efforts are now being put forth to extend the present bill another 6 months to December 31.

The sugar beet industry as a whole was quite disappointed to learn that at a meeting held in Chicago on January 13, the implement manufacturers would be unable to supply the harvesters that could be sold this year. It seems that steel is one of the big bottlenecks in implement manufacture, and bearings are even more of a problem, with the result that the manufacturers plan to build only about one-fourth of the harvesting machines that the sugar beet industry feels would be needed.

The sugar beet growers are taking to the mechanization program very rapidly; and I am quite sure that if more machines were made available all of them would be placed with sugar beet growers. Now that we know these machines are not going to be built we must again plan to carry on with hand labor, although with a lesser number than in former years.

In conclusion, I would like to quote from the report on the sugar situation issued by our subcommittee of the Committee on Agriculture, dated February 1. That committee said:

The committee feels that steps should now be taken to assure abundant sugar production in the United States, including Hawaii and Puerto Rico, for use by the American people in 1948. Adequate supplies of fertilizer, labor, and machinery should be provided sugar-beet and sugar-cane growers, as well as a satisfactory incentive to secure maximum production in all United States sugar-producing areas. The time to plan for sugar supplies for use in 1948 is at hand. Failure to do so can only mean continued shortages of sugar.

This statement goes on to say that labor is necessary. I sincerely hope that this bill will be adopted.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 2. Upon the enactment of this act—

(a) The provisions of the Farm Labor Supply Appropriation Act, 1944 (Public Law 229, 78th Cong., 2d sess., title I), as amended and supplemented, and as extended by this act, shall not be construed to limit or interfere with any of the functions of the United States Employment Service or State public employment services with respect to maintaining a farm placement service as authorized under the act of June 6, 1933 (48 Stat. 113).

(b) The Secretary of Agriculture and the Secretary of Labor shall take such action as may be necessary to assure maximum cooperation between the agricultural extension services of the land-grant colleges and the State public employment agencies in the recruitment and placement of domestic farm labor and in the keeping of such records and information with respect thereto as may be necessary for the proper and efficient administration of the State unemployment compensation laws and of title V of the Servicemen's Readjustment Act of 1944, as amended (58 Stat. 295).

The CHAIRMAN. Under the rule, the Committee rises.

Accordingly the Committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. SPRINGER, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union, reported that that Committee having had under consideration the bill (H. R. 2102) to provide for a 6 months' extension and final liquidation of the farm labor supply program, and for other purposes, pursuant to House Resolution 124, he reported the bill back to the House.

The SPEAKER. Under the rule, the previous question is ordered.

The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was read the third time.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. BUCK) there were—ayes 140, noes 39.

Mr. HOLIFIELD. Mr. Speaker, I object to the vote on the ground that a quorum is not present and make the point of order that a quorum is not present.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will count. [After counting.] One hundred and ninety-nine Members are present, not a quorum.

The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify absent Members, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 243, nays 110, not voting 79, as follows:

ADJOURNMENT OVER

Mr. ALLEN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourns today it adjourn to meet on Thursday next.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

SEA-AIR TRANSPORTATION—WHY NOT?

Mr. ALLEN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BRADLEY] be permitted to extend his remarks at this point in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

Mr. BRADLEY of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, the responsibility of our Merchant Marine and Fisheries Committee is to strive to maintain the American merchant marine paramount on the high seas. For many years the most progressive elements of the American merchant marine have been seeking to utilize overseas aircraft in conjunction with steamships for the purpose of coordinating the two facilities and providing the public with an integrated and improved transportation service. Congress itself gave energy to this program by incorporating in section 212 of the Merchant Marine Act of 1936 a provision which authorizes and directs the Maritime Commission to cooperate with vessel owners in devising means by which transoceanic aircraft service may be used in connection with or in lieu of steamships. Following that authorization, great progress was made in planning the use of flying boats in conjunction with steamships.

When the Civil Aeronautics Act of 1938 was adopted, the steamship lines, having been assured that the act gave them the right to enter the air transport field on the basis of equality with any other person, stepped up their plans for the establishment of coordinated sea and air services.

In creating the Civil Aeronautics Board, the Congress provided a national policy for the regulation of aeronautics and the development of a sound economic and adequate transportation system by air—properly adapted to the needs of the foreign and domestic commerce of the United States, of the postal service, and of national defense. The ultimate objectives of this policy are identical with those prescribed for the Maritime Commission for the development of our American merchant marine.

But, under the Civil Aeronautics Act of 1938, no steamship company can operate in overseas or foreign air commerce until a certificate of convenience and necessity has been issued by the Civil Aeronautics Board. In its decisions the Board has held that this act "rigidly limits the participation of the older forms of transportation in the air-transport field." It interpreted a section of the act as extremely restrictive and only those limited air-transport services which are auxiliary and supplementary to other transport operations and which are therefore incidental thereto can meet the conditions laid down by that proviso.

We in the Merchant Marine and Fisheries Committee have heretofore been helpless in coping with the Civil Aeronautics Board, inasmuch as all legislation pertaining to its activities is assigned to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce. Consequently, last week, I introduced House Resolution 109 for the purposes of amending the rules of the House so that measures concerning the operation of aircraft by shipping companies over their own shipping routes would be referred to our committee. We are most hopeful that this resolution will be enacted so that we can get to the bottom of the sea-air controversy and set the Civil Aeronautics Board straight on this issue once and for all.

While we here in America are denying to our merchant marine the right to operate transoceanic aircraft service, our world-wide competitors are reaping the cream of the crop. Our Civil Aeronautics Board, persuant to commendable bilateral agreements with other countries, has readily granted overseas air permits to 15 foreign lines and is obligated to grant a possible 19 more. Negotiations are in progress with 13 others. The most active and important of these are in one way or another controlled or dominated by foreign subsidized steamship interests. We are favoring foreigners instead of Americans in this instance.

The CAB in actual practice has excluded, on major routes, all air applicants which did not exist at the time of its inception, permitting those fortunate companies then existent—such as Pan American, TWA, and American Airlines—to build themselves through the war years into vast networks and granting to them alone the right to fly overseas. Our entire domestic American air transport business is being monopolized by a total of only 28 certificated air lines and practically all of our overseas air commerce is being conducted by only six certificated air lines. The Big Four of these companies do 66 percent of the total domestic business.

Contrast the above with the fact that there are over 143 steamship companies engaged in carrying our domestic and foreign water-borne trade—with no artificial barriers to new entries in foreign commerce.

The fact that the steamship lines are the only ones with the management, finances, and overseas organizations to adequately protect American foreign trade seems to escape the Civil Aeronautics Board. Also the Board apparently has not awakened to the tragic fact that their monopolistic grants to these favored few air-line companies are probably the "kiss of death" for some of them. It is well known that the domestic air lines are making an unholy mess of their business—many of you may have read the article in Fortune magazine last August entitled "What's Wrong With the Air Lines," or the article in the Saturday Evening Post for October 19, 1946, entitled "Why Air Passengers Get Mad," and there have been numerous others. It will obviously take every ounce of energy that the domestic air lines can muster to put their tottering house in order. To, at this time, saddle them with the difficult job of developing the complicated pattern of our overseas foreign trade is leading them to disaster through financial and managerial overexpansion. The overseas job is simply asking too much of them—first, because they are overtaxed at home; second, because of their lack of experience in foreign trade; and, third, because of the intense and experienced competition being brought to bear by our foreign competitors.

While we are on this subject let us remember, also, that it has been the business of the United States flag steamship companies to maintain contact men, agents, and establishments not only in Europe but throughout the ports and inland cities of the world since the days of the clipper ships and the China trade. It still is, and these facilities exist today. It is this 100 years of knowledge and assets that our CAB to date has ignored in dividing the trade and travel zones of half the world among these favored few air lines, of which but one—Pan American—enjoyed any direct previous overseas experience; the second—American—bought out a ship company's air line to enter the market the CAB had given it, and the third began world-wide services with no prior foreign commercial experience at all.

To appreciate the tragic economic significance of the exclusion of ship lines from world air trade, it must be remembered that passenger traffic on American-flag vessels ceased with Pearl Harbor, and since December 7, 1941, all passenger and cargo passenger ships of our merchant marine have been requisitioned by our Government for use of the Army and Navy as troop transports, hospital ships, and so forth, and now, of course, are being released. World commerce entered a new era during the war, with air transport becoming a major enterprise and successful and profitable shipping operations are no longer a matter of surface carriers functioning independently—and of course they are not yet a matter of aircraft functioning alone. The two mediums are natural collaborators and in fact, I believe, are inseparable. I firmly believe that the maritime operator who offers an integrated sea and air service in the future will get the business and the operator who does not offer it will eventually go out of business. It seems that all the major maritime nations, except the United States, have recognized the situation, and are making provision for it. British shipping lines are being not only permitted but encouraged by their government to supplement their existing surface facilities with aircraft. The great shipping lines of Sweden, Norway, and Holland are authorized by their governments to conduct integrated sea and air services.

Our steamship carriers are not seeking to acquire control of air transportation. They have been merely requesting from the CAB authorization to perform overseas and foreign air service in conjunction with their steamship service over and along their established steamship routes. They do not even request exclusive rights over these routes, but are willing to operate in competition with any other air service that the CAB may consider to be in the public interest.

If the steamship carriers are authorized to enter the air-transportation field, they will merely be handling the same traffic which they have handled for many years and which they have done much to build.

Maintain our merchant marine paramount is the aim and responsibility of our Merchant Marine and Fisheries Committee. We believe that the merchant marine of tomorrow will be a powerful protector of our economic safety which must be zealously guarded to assure greater economic stability to the whole world. A strong merchant marine will help keep war away from America and promote our good-neighbor policy to all nations. In this postwar world, it is clear that we will have a Navy commensurate with our national stature. Our merchant marine as an auxiliary thereto must be equally as strong and an adequate merchant marine calls for a coordinate merchant marine air-sea transportation system. This I feel certain was the policy of the Congress in 1936 when it enacted the Merchant Marine Act. Our Maritime Commission has been consistent in voicing that same opinion.

The position of our American merchant marine in this postwar period will be difficult at best. Other maritime nations, who through a combination of war losses and our accelerated building program, have been relegated to minor roles, are striving desperately to regain their former positions on the high seas. British shipowners have been urged and encouraged to pursue a policy of aggressive competition with us. In fact, while their yards are feverishly building a newer, faster fleet, we graciously permit them to continue to operate 360 United States-owned vessels in direct contravention of the intent of Congress as expressed in the Ship Sales Act of 1946. It has again and again been asserted that postwar competition in shipping will be keener and more serious than any heretofore met by American steamship companies. It is only dear Uncle Sam who has adopted a short-sighted policy of restricting the merchant marine in the utilization of aircraft in connection with steamship operations. Unless we change that short-sighted policy, and do it soon, this vital auxiliary of our Army and Navy and important factor in our international trade will be able to offer only surface transportation in competition with the integrated and efficient sea-air service offered by foreign lines. We are indeed at the present, handing on a silver platter to foreign lines, the cream of our future overseas commerce. The interests of the American wage-earner, the American taxpayer are tied up in this problem because in an effort to place American ships on a basis of competitive equality with foreign-flag ships, Congress has provided large subsidies to equalize the cost of construction and operation. These farsighted measures will be rendered largely ineffective unless we permit our merchant marine to compete on equal grounds with those of foreign nations.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. WOLCOTT asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include an address he made last Wednesday night, February 26, before the National Association of Home Builders of the United States, on the question of housing and rents.

Mr. OWENS asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include a telegram from the Illinois Master Plumbers Association and the Plumbing Contractors Association of Illinois with respect to wrought steel pipe.

Mr. KEATING asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include a bill introduced by him today.

The SPEAKER. Under previous order of the House, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BENDER] is recognized for 30 minutes.

WAR ASSETS AND OUR PROCUREMENT DEPARTMENT

Mr. BENDER. Mr. Speaker, during the war the Navy purchased raincoats in very large quantities and used top priorities in obtaining them at a cost of something between $8.50 to $10.50 per coat. After the cessation of hostilities when the Navy Department took account of its stock, it was found that the supplies of these coats was very excessive and several hundred thousand were sold as surplus at a price of a little over $3 per coat.

These coats have been kicking around the market for some time. In fact, during the last 2 or 3 weeks they have been advertised by a New York jobber offering to sell a quantity at under $4 per coat.

Now, we understand that the Navy Purchasing Department at 111 East Fifteenth Street, New York City, last week sent out invitations to a number of manufacturers to supply over 60,000 new coats of exactly the same type. I believe the bids are to be opened on March 6, and according to the terms of the invitations, contractors must start delivery in March and complete the contract in 4 months, a condition which anyone with the slightest experience in either purchasing or manufacturing knows could not be met, as it normally takes between 6 weeks to 2 months in order to finish the cloth, have it coated, combined, and manufactured into finished garments.

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BENDER. I yield.

Mr. HOFFMAN. Do I understand you correctly that the Navy bought these coats and then sold them as surplus for a fraction of the original cost and that now the Navy Department is buying other coats of the same quality, paying a much higher price. Is that what is happening?

Mr. BENDER. That is right.

Mr. HOFFMAN. How can that be?

Mr. BENDER. Some of these things that the Government and the Government agencies do are past all understanding. No one can possibly understand how they do these things. But here is a concrete illustration of the way the Navy Procurement, the Army Procurement, and the War Surplus agencies operate. These garments were purchased by the Navy at a cost of $8.50 to $10.50 per coat.

Mr. JENNINGS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BENDER. I yield.

Mr. JENNINGS. Of course, that contributes to the deficit in the Treasury and gives force and effect to the gentlemen who do not want to cut the budget or have taxes reduced or have any payment made on the public debt. It is perfectly consistent with the philosophy of the New Deal.

Mr. BENDER. The gentleman is 100 percent correct.

Mr. ROBSION. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BENDER. I yield.

Mr. ROBSION. The gentleman said that that was the way the bureaus of the Government and the Navy and other departments, such as the War Assets Corporation, operate. Does it not clearly show that that is the way in which they do not operate?

Mr. BENDER. That is correct.

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BENDER. I yield.

Mr. HOFFMAN. The gentleman is a very distinguished and active member of the committee to which has been referred the unification bill. Do you think there is some prospect that that bill might help if we create one purchasing agency for the two services? Do you think it might help in preventing such a condition as you have here described?

Mr. BENDER. I am not at all convinced that it will. As a matter of fact, I have my doubts, but I have an open mind on that issue. I am waiting to hear what the gentlemen have to say about it when they come before our committee.

Mr. O'KONSKI. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BENDER. I yield.

Mr. O'KONSKI. The distinguished gentleman from Ohio has stated that it is the policy that the left hand not know what the right hand doeth. I think that is a wrong interpretation. I think the left hand knows what the right hand is doing, because it creates more jobs.

Mr. BENDER. Well, I think the gentleman has a point there.

Mr. JENNINGS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BENDER. I yield.

Mr. JENNINGS. How many coats are being sold at these bargain prices for which advertisements have been published for more coats of the same kind at many times the price?

Mr. BENDER. Sixty thousand additional coats. They have disposed of thousands of these garments at $3 per coat, which cost the American taxpayers anywhere from $8.50 to $10.50 each.

Mr. JENNINGS. What are they? Raincoats?

Mr. BENDER. They are raincoats. Under the market conditions today I doubt seriously if the Navy can purchase these garments for any less than twelve or fourteen dollars per coat. They sold them for $3, and they sold them in great quantities. Now they are opening bids on March 6 for 60,000 of these very garments that they sold. If you can imagine a more ridiculous operation, I cannot think of it. It requires certain processing that the manufacturers of the cloth cannot possibly produce in the time specified in the Navy specifications. It is perfectly absurd.

Several prospective bidders have approached a manufacturer requesting a price and the deliveries of the dyed cloth. I repeat, after having expressed their surprise that the Navy Department having so recently disposed of large quantities of these coats at a substantial loss, they should now be trying to buy an additional quantity. I feel sure that the orders placed today for additional quantities will far exceed, as I have said before, the original cost of $8.50 to $10.50 per coat. As one manufacturer expressed it, this seems to be where our money goes.

Yesterday I had a call from an officer in the Veterans' Bureau. This Veterans' Bureau is crying for typewriters and for various business machines which the War Department has in abundance. As he put it, "They are lousy with them." They have those machines in great quantities which they have frozen for 5 years. We know that in 5 years most of those machines will be obsolete. We know that today we are in an economy Congress and that those machines are needed now by other governmental agencies. If the War Department cannot use them now they should be released.

Mr. JENNINGS. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. BENDER. I yield.

Mr. JENNINGS. Of course that would be contrary to the fixed policy of the administration, because if those machines are sold now while they are usable and while there is a big demand for them and while they are inaccessible from those who make them because they are unable to make them on account of steel, and so forth, they would bring a big price.

Mr. BENDER. Of course they would.

Mr. JENNINGS. But under this policy they keep it for 5 years, until it becomes obsolete, then they will sell them for a very small price, a song, and the Government will sing it. Then there will be a big loss; so the administration is entirely consistent.

Mr. BENDER. I wish to say to the gentleman that the Hoffman committee, the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments, got the authority today from the House to really go to work. They have some of the tools to work with.

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BENDER. I yield.

Mr. HOFFMAN. What does the gentleman mean? We got some authority here today; but does not the gentleman realize that they have not given us so much as a red cent?

Mr. BENDER. I will amend my statement to say that we have some authority but we do not have the money that we need to really do the job.

Mr. HOFFMAN. The gentleman knows what makes the old horse go.

Mr. BENDER. But now we do have the authority to subpena some of these gentlemen, call them in, and ask them some questions that we did not have until today.

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. BENDER. I yield.

Mr. HOFFMAN. It is my understanding that the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. JUDD], who is on that committee, is preparing a bill calling for the departments to declare this surplus property surplus and then to sell it.

The gentleman is a member of the committee. He will recall that we wrote a bill on the floor and that the bill was so amended as to give priorities to half a dozen different agencies, to give priorities to veterans. It has been my experience that I have never been able to get one single thing for a veteran on his priority.

Mr. BENDER. I cannot understand how so much of this merchandise is sold to veterans and then it finds its way to the counters of the largest department stores in the country in great quantities such as was the case about which I informed the House last week wherein pajamas that were sold in Cleveland by a department store at a retail price of $2.39. The War Assets Administration has hundreds of thousands of new pajamas for sale. Our national prisons and hospitals need those pajamas. WAA has thousands of towels, sheets, mattress covers, shorts, shirts. Our Treasury Procurement Department needs these.

You might think that this is an ideal situation to save Uncle Sam's taxpayers some of their hard-earned money. But somewhere, somehow, somebody is slipping up. Those pajamas—100,000 pairs of them—cost you $1.50 a pair. They could get $2 on any market. Our WAA advertised them for sale at $1.08 per pair to veterans and priority holders out in St. Louis. Somehow, part of them found their way to the counters of a retail department store in Cleveland, where they were marked down from $2.95 to $2.39. Meanwhile, the purchasing agents of our Treasury Procurement Department were out buying the same kind of merchandise for a lot more than $1.08.

There is something rotten here, and we do not mean the state of Denmark. WAA tells us that it sends out notices to all Government agencies announcing its sales. To date there is no word of explanation from the agencies that ought to be vitally interested in buying. One hand just does not seem to know what the other hand is doing, and when that happens too often it sounds like some fancy prestidigitation.

I trust this entire problem will get the immediate attention not only of our committee but of the entire Congress, inasmuch as we are economizing and we say that we are going to reduce the cost of government, and since we have between twenty and thirty billions of dollars of merchandise on our hands today that we cannot possible use, it should be declared surplus and sold, using modern merchandising methods—and that is very simple. Why, a peanut-stand man can tell some of these important military people who are in the War Assets Administration what to do with the stuff and how to get the money out of it.

Mr. JENNINGS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BENDER. I yield.

Mr. JENNINGS. The gentleman has made a very informative and constructive criticism of this situation. If the people in charge of the disposal of this surplus property had got hold of some successful operator of a peanut stand this debacle would not have taken place.

Mr. BENDER. The gentleman is absolutely right. I want to make another statement, which is apropos of what we are talking about. I read a number of criticisms today. This may be just a little bit off the subject, yet it has something to do with our responsibility in this Congress. I say the Republican Members of this Congress have cooperated wonderfully well and are doing a grand job. I appreciate the fact that the national chairman of the Republican Party has asked for cooperation. I am sure he is not referring to this body when he asks for that cooperation. The national Republican chairman is not out of order in calling attention to our platform and to the fact that we need cooperation. That there is a need for teamwork. No one can take exception to that. It is entirely in order. Our leadership in this House has an eye single to our platform which calls for efficiency in the matter of disposal of these surplus commodities, balancing the budget, reducing the cost of government, and reducing taxes.

Those of us in the majority party, I am sure, are not going to be deterred in our efforts to see to it that our platform pledges are kept and, irrespective of what the opposition says, we are going to perform and we are performing. Our committees are functioning as I have never known them to function in the years I have been a Member of this body. We are doing an excellent job and we have nothing to apologize for. By the time July 1 rolls around, the American people will be pleased with our performance.

The people of America have a right to expect better sense from their Government than the administrative rulers of our country have exhibited to date. The arrogant despots who have made a shambles of OPA and CPA, who devote their time to preventing the people of our country from seeking to improve the land which gave them birth, do not represent the needs or the desires of this Nation. The best of them succumb to the mania for the assertion of authority and power which afflicts every petty bureaucrat, and we have seen the rise of a new era of administrative lawmakers who are responsible to no one and who conceal their activities in the cloak of anonymity.

It is time to end this tyranny. It is time to end the nightmarish illusion fostered by our Government that controls which are completely out of keeping with the sentiment of the Nation and with human nature, can achieve prosperity. Prosperity and economic plenty can come only with the establishment of a general Nation-wide climate of cooperation and economic sanity. The Republican Party is taking the lead in preparing a legislative program for the Eightieth Congress which will demonstrate that constructive conservatism is no less dramatic than irresponsible bureaucratic radicalism, and far more beneficial to the well-being of this great country.

I say to you that the Republican Party today stands in exactly the same position as a good doctor. This country is sick. We have permitted a cancerous growth to cut down our life stream, to stop the circulation of our blood. What does a surgeon do when he comes across a cancer? He cuts it out first. Is that constructive? You bet it is. The Republican Party is the surgeon. Before we can start the treatment, we will have to clean out the dry rot.

And when that job is done, what will the Republican Party do?

The first thing we will do will be to balance the Federal budget. A few months ago our President said that he hoped to balance it. Three days afterward his Secretary of the Treasury said that it could not be done just yet. Then, when everybody was trying to figure out which one was kidding us, the two of them got together and said that it was all a mistake; they were really saying the same thing. But the only thing that we really do know is that the Republican Party is the party that believes in cutting down Government expenses.

To balance the budget, we must cut out all war agencies. The Republican Party believes that the war emergency is over. It is time to declare that the war has ended, to wipe out the amazing powers we have given to a few men, to let the country know that the duration is over. And when we have finally ended the war and balanced the budget, the Republican Party will go to work to solve the complex problems of labor and management.

This is a Government of laws and not of men. There must be some place where every argument gets finally settled. When people in our country get into a dispute and go to court, they know that eventually somebody is going to lose.

They do not refuse to accept the final decision. In our labor-management issues, somebody must have the final word. Every dispute must go through some channels to a final decision. Incredible as it may seem, under the present national administration there is no such animal as a court of final resort in the whole area of labor disputes, and when the Republican Party has ended the war emergency and balanced the budget and worked out an intelligent labor-management policy, we will start our country rolling on the production lines. Once that happens, we shall be able to take our place in solving the world's major problems. We shall be able to raise world living standards by producing more goods at lower prices than any other nation on the face of the globe.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under previous order of the House, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SMITH] is recognized for 25 minutes.

GREECE

Mr. SMITH of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, according to news reports, Britain has made a proposal to the United States to assume the burden of maintaining her military position in Greece. It is said the United States has agreed in principle to this request.

Upon receipt of the British request, President Truman called a secret conference of congressional leaders of both parties and they were given the complete low-down on the crisis at a hush-hush conference at the White House.

We are further informed that a bipartisan move was afoot on Capitol Hill to provide cash quickly to execute this commitment. Upward of $400,000,000 and at least 50 Liberty ships would be required to carry out our part of the deal. We are to believe that the transaction does not provide for direct military intervention in Greece, but that some military aid has been promised. One newspaper says that what military assistance the United States is prepared to give was reported to consist of weapons and ammunition only. The weapons would be entirely of the small-arms type; no troops, under any circumstances, would be dispatched.

Britain, we are informed, is planning to withdraw her economic support from Greece by the end of this month, because of her economic stringency at home. Although officially in London no reference is made to the Soviet Union, there is no attempt in quarters close to the British Government to hide the serious concern lest the withdrawal lead to a political vacuum in Greece on which communism would certainly try to capitalize for the benefit of Moscow. The authoritative view in London is that Greece is the kingpin of the entire Mediterranean situation. If withdrawal from Greece were followed by civil war and chaos, with Communist-dominated parties gaining control, then Turkey would be bound to be decisively affected. This might well start the snowball rolling westward, with unpredictable results in Italy and eventually in France as well.

This should be enough to give the American people a pretty good idea of the situation that confronts them. What this, in substance, amounts to is that the British have officially informed the United States that their economy and military power have become so weakened that they are no longer able to hold their Empire together. They have now formally turned to the United States and are importuning us to assume that burden for them.

Guns and ships now for Britain to hold her military position in Greece, kingpin of the Mediterranean. Who would be next on the list? It is already hinted that the Dardanelles also present something in the nature of a key to the control of the Mediterranean and much that lies beyond. Would not the provisioning of Britain with munitions of war to fortify her position in Greece anticipate the need to do the same for her in Turkey?

What about Austria, France, Belgium, Holland, Norway, Finland, "Free Poland," Czechoslovakia, and the others? Are they not one and all of the family of kingpins controlling things tangible and intangible that we would fain have on our side to preserve the democracy that was made safe for all mankind by World War I and the incarnation of the "four freedoms" and universal peace that were so auspiciously vouchsafed us by World War II?

Then there is the vacuum where Germany was. What thought, if any, is being given to it, sphinx of all sphinxes for the wise diplomats and statesmen and military geniuses in this hour of world travail? Could it be possible they might be meditating on whether there could be some human material in that fearful chasm which might somehow be made to underpin the forces of democracy against those of communism?

What, are we starting off on another round of lend-lease? Is the United States again to become the arsenal? And if so, for what? And are we going to complete the whole cycle for the third time?

Of course, dissolution of the British Empire would have deleterious repercussions on the United States. No one can envision the harm that would come to our people should this eventuate. All thinking persons agree that this will be great if worst does come to worst. But if the character and nerve of the English people have been so enervated that they can persuade themselves that slavery—"all socialism involves slavery," said one of England's greatest prophets, Herbert Spencer—is preferable to liberty, which surely appears to be the case, what in the world can the United States do to save their Empire?

Nothing can be done to save much of anything for any nation that neglects its real seers and follows a false god like Lord Keynes.

Even should the United States by military force hold intact the British Empire, England under her socialist system could not possibly maintain it. It should not require much discussion to show that we could not long do this for her.

I, for one, refuse to be bound by any agreement, whether by commission or omission, that may have been entered into by any leaders of my party to furnish Britain aid for maintaining her military establishment in Greece or anywhere else.

The United States will have to stop somewhere. It is sheer madness to believe that we can support economically and financially the whole world. The cult of internationalism has already committed our Nation to more than it can deliver and endure. It must be thwarted before it is too late.

The United States could do something to dampen the fires of communism that are raging in Europe and elsewhere by simply discontinuing the ill-advised policy of pouring out financial and other aid to the peoples involved. When we stop pampering them they will go to work and start on the way to sanity.

If we really want to fight communism there is plenty of work for us to do right here at home, for we are already in it almost up to our necks. It is not Russian communism we have to fear but New Deal communism.

Mr. SCHWABE of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SMITH of Ohio. I yield to the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. SCHWABE of Missouri. I think the gentleman should be commended for making such a timely and thoughtful speech. It evidences much research on his part.

May I ask the gentleman if he thinks there will be any end to it if we embark upon this third cycle, as he called it? What can we see in the future as an end to such possible world participation on our part to help the British Empire?

Mr. SMITH of Ohio. I feel that the participation of the United States in the last war went a long way toward destroying our America. In my judgment, it will be difficult to restore her to a normal state of health. I sincerely believe that if the United States is dragged into another world war, the prospect of saving any of the social and spiritual values we have heretofore considered basic to our welfare will be very difficult.

Mr. SCHWABE of Missouri. I take it, then, that the gentleman's position is that if we are to do the most we can for humanity and for the world as a whole we should think of America first and be sure to keep America strong as a nucleus around which to build?

Mr. SMITH of Ohio. I feel that way.

Mr. McDOWELL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SMITH of Ohio. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. McDOWELL. It appears that England takes the position that if she withdraws from Greece communism will overcome Greece. Has it occurred to the gentleman from Ohio that since Great Britain is now pouring troops, money, and ammunition every day into Palestine, a few miles away from Greece, and since there is no intention on the part of Britain, as far as I can see, to retire from Palestine, perhaps the solution of Britain's problem would be to remove her establishment from Palestine, where it is not wanted, and take it up to Greece, where it is wanted? Does not the gentleman believe that might at least relieve America of the burden of doing this thing?

Mr. SMITH of Ohio. It is very difficult to know what the true situation is with respect to Palestine.

SENATE

WEDNESDAY, MARCH 5, 1947

(Legislative day of Wednesday, February 19, 1947)

The Senate met at 12 o'clock meridian, on the expiration of the recess.

The Chaplain, Rev. Peter Marshall, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Our Father, we know that we, by ourselves, are not sufficient for these days and for problems greater than the measure of our best wisdom. We pray that Thou wilt grant safe journey to our Secretary of State as he carries the hopes and the prayers of this Nation to the conference across the sea. A soldier himself, may he remember the price that was paid by millions for this opportunity, and may we, who pray for the success of the mission, be willing to pay the price for peace.

We believe, O Lord, that Thou wilt be present, with the marks of the nails in Thy hands, to lead them, and bless them, if they will receive Thy spirit.

May the ministers be aware of the Unseen Delegate. May Thy spirit move them, that there may be concession without coercion, and conciliation without compromise. May they, who represent us, represent Thee and, in Thy spirit, be courageous enough to begin anew, fearless enough to admit mistakes, and loving enough to forgive others. May we have the courage to apply what we applaud, to the end that we may help to establish Thy way of life for the people of the world. So may we all do the best we can, by Thy help, and be willing to leave the issue in Thy hands, through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

"To the Congress of the United States:

"Your memorialist respectfully represents:

"The Congress of the United States, on the 10th day of August 1946, enacted chapter 951, tite V, section 501, 60 Statutes —, subsection (a) of which provided that Federal contribution to the States for old-age assistance for the period commencing October 1, 1946, and ending December 31, 1947, shall be two-thirds of the State's expenditures up to $15 monthly per individual plus one-half of the State's expenditure over $15, and one-half of the State's expenditure for administration.

"The need for increased old-age assistance will continue long past December 31, 1947, and Federal contribution is necessary to properly assist the aged persons of the State of Arizona and the other States.

"Wherefore your memorialist, the House of Representatives of the State of Arizona, requests:

"1. The Congress of the United States reenact the provisions of chapter 951, title V, section 501, 60 Statutes —, making the same a permanent part of the laws of the United States.

"Passed the house February 25 1947.

"Filed in the office of the secretary of state February 25, 1947."

A joint memorial of the Legislature of the Territory of Alaska; to the Committee on Public Lands:

"Senate Joint Memorial 10

"To the President of the United States; Congress of the United States; the Honorable Julius A. Krug, Secretary of the Interior; and the Subcommittee on Appropriations:

"Your memorialist, the Legislature of the Territory of Alaska, in eighteenth session assembled, respectfully submits that:

"Whereas adequate transportation is vital to the civilian economy of the Territory of Alaska; and

"Whereas the Alaska Railroad, operating between Seward, Whittier, Anchorage, and Fairbanks, is one of the few main transportation arteries that are available to the people of the Territory for the necessary transport of supplies and equipment required for the support of homes and businesses over a large area; and

"Whereas the necessity of developing military and naval bases in the Territory of Alaska for the proper defense of the United States has been demonstrated beyond question and to properly construct, supply, and maintain such military bases in many areas would be impossible without the Alaska Railroad being maintained and equipped to transport the required tonnage; and

"Whereas there has been no substantial rehabilitation of roadbed, structures, or equipment of the railroad for many years and as a result its condition is such that it cannot now adequately care for either civilian or military freight; and

"Whereas a program has been advanced to provide the required new equipment, roadbed, and buildings to place the railroad in good condition with a proper plant sufficient to efficiently discharge its responsibilities in moving freight and passengers that are now available.

"Now, therefore, your memorialist, the Legislature of the Territory of Alaska, respectfully prays that the Department of the Interior and the Congress of the United States recognize the necessity of the adoption of the proposed rehabilitation plan of the Alaska Railroad, or one similar in extent, and make available the required funds to carry it out without delay as the need is immediate and urgent, and failure to carry out such a program would result in a complete breakdown of the only rail transportation in the Territory of Alaska and do irreparable harm, both from a civilian and military standpoint.

"And your memorialist will ever pray."

A joint memorial of the Legislature of the State of Utah; to the Committee on Appropriations:

"House Joint Memorial 5

"Joint memorial to the Congress of the United States to appropriate money for the construction of a dam and reservoir in aid of the Bear River migratory bird refuge

"Be it resolved by the Legislature of the State of Utah:

"Whereas the State of Utah by its act of February 15, 1929, has consented to the acquisition of lands by the United States for the establishment, maintenance, and operation of a refuge for migratory wild fowl at the Bear River Bay and vicinity; and

"Whereas the United States has constructed the Bear River migratory bird refuge at a cost of over a million dollars; and

"Whereas said refuge is not operating at its maximum efficiency due to lack of a controlled water supply; and

"Whereas the construction of a dam at or in the vicinity of Deweyville, Boxelder County, Utah, would provide storage water for use on the Bear River refuge, and would permit the distribution of such water during the dry summer months thus assuring adequate feed for wild fowl and providing a stable habitat for the nesting and hatching of wild fowl; and

"Whereas the construction of said dam and the stabilized water supply would thereby eliminate the death of wild fowl from botulism or a western duck malady; and

"Whereas the Bear River refuge is a principal migration route of the Central and Pacific flyway and the benefits derived from a maximum functional operation of the Bear River refuge will benefit all of the sportsmen and bird lovers in the western United States as well as in Canada and Mexico; and

"Whereas the wild fowl population has decreased to alarming proportions; and

"Whereas the legislature believes that the construction of such a dam and reservoir will be a benefit to all of the United States and Dominion of Canada and the Republic of Mexico; and

"Whereas the construction of said dam at said site will not impair nor conflict with any beneficial use of such waters for domestic, municipal stock water, irrigation, power or industrial purposes: Be it therefore

"Resolved, That the State Legislature of Utah in regular session assembled hereby urges Congress to provide an appropriation of $650,000 to be used in the construction of a dam and reservoir at Deweyville, Boxelder County, State of Utah, for the purpose of impounding and storing the surplus waters of the Bear River for use on the Bear River migratory water-fowl refuge and such other migratory water-fowl projects as may be benefited therefrom; be it further

"Resolved, That the secretary of state send copies of this resolution to the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives of the United States, to the chairman of the Wildlife Subcommittees of the Committees on Agriculture of the House of Representatives of the United States, and the Senate of the United States, and to Members of the congressional delegation from the State of Utah."

PROTEST AGAINST REDUCTION IN CERTAIN GOVERNMENT APPROPRIATIONS

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to present for appropriate reference and printing in the RECORD a resolution adopted by the Federal Workers Union, Local No. 20, United Public Workers of America (CIO), New York City, N. Y., protesting against reduction in certain Government appropriations.

There being no objection, the resolution was received, referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Whereas Congress is planning to slash Government appropriations drastically without regard for the proper functioning of our Government; and

Whereas Congress by these slashes intends to cripple and wipe out vital government services needed by, fought for, and won by the American people; and

Whereas the American people suffered severely to help win the war against fascism and are now entitled to the benefits of the democracy that they fought for; and

Whereas additional thousands of Federal employees who have served their Government loyally and conscientiously throughout the war period and since will be laid off unnecessarily; and

Whereas laid-off Government workers do not benefit by the unemployment compensation law: Therefore be it

Resolved, That Federal Workers Union, Local 20, United Public Workers of America, CIO, at its membership meeting held on Wednesday, February 26, 1947, opposes slashes in Government appropriations for socially necessary Government functions under the guise of economy, and demands—

1. Extension of socially necessary Government functions.

2. Increased appropriations to promote the welfare of the American people.

3. Revision of the present tax laws to tax those who can afford to pay.

4. Unemployment compensation for laid-off Federal workers; be it further

Resolved, That copies of this resolution be sent to President Truman, members of the House and Senate Appropriation Committees, members of the House and Senate Civil Service Committees, all New York Congressmen and Senators, the Greater New York CIO Council, and the press.

EMPLOYMENT RIGHTS OF WORLD WAR II VETERANS

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to present a resolution adopted by the Francis Brown Lowry Post, No. 501, Veterans of Foreign Wars of the United States, relating to the employment rights of World War II veterans, and request that it be appropriately referred and printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the resolution was received, referred to the Committee on Civil Service, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Be it resolved by the Francis Brown Lowry Post, No. 501, Veterans of Foreign Wars of the United States:

Whereas it has come to the attention of the members of Francis Brown Lowry Post, No. 501, Veterans of Foreign Wars of the United States, that certain evasions of the letter and spirit of the laws of the United States relating to the protection of World War II veterans in positions and jobs held by them when inducted or received in service of the armed forces have been practiced and permitted by municipal, State, and national employment authorities; and

Whereas pretended reclassification of jobs and positions and reorganizations of departments and other methods have been employed to circumvent returning World War II veterans regaining the jobs and positions, advancements and increases in salary due them; and

Whereas nonveterans are now holding positions and jobs and enjoying advancements rightfully belonging to World War II veterans; Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That this post deems such practices illegal, unfair, and inimical to the best interests of World War II veterans and the Veterans of Foreign Wars of the United States; that we hereby call upon the Congress of the United States and the legislature of the State of Colorado to speedily enact legislation which will adequately protect the veterans in their jobs and positions, prevent unjust discrimination, prohibit such practices, and provide for punishment for violations of the employment rights of World War II veterans; be it further

Resolved, That copies of this resolution be sent to the Governor of the State of Colorado, the Members of Congress from the State of Colorado and to the several members of the State legislature of the State of Colorado.

ADDITIONAL FUNDS FOR ACCESS ROADS TO STANDING TIMBER

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, Mr. Creedon, who is the Veterans' Housing Expediter, is endeavoring to do a very good job under most difficult circumstances and handicaps. One of the great problems in connection with the housing program is that of getting out logs from which to cut lumber. In the West there is involved the problem, arising because of the lack of access roads, of reaching the timberlands which are on Government property.

At the last session of Congress, funds to the extent of approximately $15,000,000 were made available for the construction of access roads; but that sum is entirely inadequate to do the job that needs to be done if the necessary lumber is to be obtained and if what I think is a sorely needed lumber-conservation program is to be carried forward. As I indicated a few days ago, if we are to undertake such a program on a sound basis, then, of course, we must devise a plan of scientific cutting so as to prevent present methods, whereby our forests are being cut at a much more rapid rate than they are being replanted. It is a truism in forestry that timber is a crop, and it should be farmed as other crops are farmed, the only difference being that it is a crop which requires years and years of growth and development before the harvest.

There is a need for scientific cutting, Mr. President, on Government-owned timberlands. We must perfect a reasonable arrangement with those who have in trust the responsibility of making the most beneficial use possible of the timber resources of the United States in the interest of the present generation, keeping in mind at all times, of course, the right of future generations to have handed down to them by those of us in this generation adequate timber resources so that they will not be confronted with the situation of a lumber shortage 50, 75, or 100 years from today; and now is the time to take such action as may be necessary to inaugurate a sound, scientific timber-cutting program.

I assure you, Mr. President, that one has only to go through the lumber areas to realize that there is need for drastic changes in our timber-cutting policies. Our lumber producers are entitled to the cooperation of the Federal Government in working out programs which include full Government cooperation; and it is necessary to a long-range program to have access to the Government-owned timber lands.

The immediate emergency is, of course, the veterans' housing program. It is the consensus of opinion that that program would be greatly expedited if we were building now, and should continue to build in the spring at a much more rapid rate, some access roads into timber which now is inaccessible.

Therefore, Mr. President, on behalf of myself and my distinguished colleague [Mr. CORDON] and the Senator from Colorado [Mr. JOHNSON], I ask unanimous consent to introduce for appropriate reference a bill which we hope will receive very early attention. It seeks in essence to make available an additional $10,000,000 which can be used for the construction of access roads this year.

There being no objection, the bill (S. 800) to make additional funds available for access roads to standing timber, introduced by Mr. MORSE (for himself, Mr. CORDON, and Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado), was received, read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

CHANGE OF NAME OF CIVIL SERVICE COMMITTEE

Mr. LANGER submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 91), which was referred to the Committee on Rules and Administration:

CLAIM OF SWISS GOVERNMENT

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The present occupant of the chair in his capacity as a Senator wishes to submit a unanimous consent request. On March 3 the Senate passed Senate bill 240 to authorize the payment of $425.88 by the United States to the Government of Switzerland. On the same date the House passed an identical bill. In order to conclude the legislation unanimous consent is requested that the Senate consider House bill 1040, to authorize the payment of $425.88 by the United States to the Government of Switzerland, and pass that bill. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the bill (H. R. 1040) to authorize the payment of $425.88 by the United States to the Government of Switzerland, was considered, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

AMENDMENT OF FEDERAL FIREARMS ACT

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, I desire to make a similar request to that just made by the President of the Senate. On March 3 the Senate passed Senate bill 502, to amend the Federal Firearms Act, and on the same date the House passed an identical bill, House bill 1778. In order to complete the legislation, I ask that the Senate now consider the House bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Wisconsin for the present consideration of House bill 1778, a bill identical with Senate bill 502, which was passed on March 3

Mr. REVERCOMB. Mr. President, I merely wish to inquire of the able Senator from Wisconsin, what is the subject matter of the bill?

Mr. WILEY. All the bill does is to include in the language embodied in the existing statute the word "robbery," which is not included in the list of crimes set forth.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Wisconsin?

There being no objection, the bill (H. R. 1778) to amend the Federal Firearms Act was considered, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PRESIDENT TRUMAN'S TRIBUTE TO THE MEXICAN CADETS WHO DIED IN DEFENSE OF CHAPULTEPEC

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, frequently—almost daily—President Truman demonstrates some attribute of greatness, but he does it in such a way and manner, so simple and modest is his customary approach, that the strong elements of character so exhibited often pass by unnoticed, unobserved, and sometimes, I fear, unappreciated. But this, Mr. President, is in itself outstanding evidence of a truly great man. When men do magnificent or superb things in a modest, unostentatious way, thinking only of the duty they are performing or the task to be accomplished, and not of their own places in the sun, then do they, indeed, approach greatness in the finest and truest sense of the word.

Such a thing occurred yesterday during President Truman's visit to our neighbor, the Republic of Mexico. Not on his program and entirely unscheduled, without any accompanying fanfare or publicity, President Truman paid a visit to and laid a wreath upon the Chapultepec Monument to Mexico's boy heroes who gave their lives in the war between that country and our own.

According to news dispatches, this simple act of a modest man, paying tribute to young boys who had given their lives for their country, completely captivated the Mexican people, and many of their newspapers are today saying that President Truman's friendly gesture in this unprecedented and unexpected way was worth a thousand orations on the good-neighbor theme. The Government of Mexico itself voiced its approval through her Foreign Minister, Jaime Torres Bodet, who eloquently said:

The highest kind of friendship between men and peoples is that which has the courage to base itself on a feeling for the truth. President Truman, by rendering homage to the immortal glory of the boy heroes in a gesture worthy of a gentleman and a friend, spans an abyss of the past by another bridge into the future.

These fine words of the Foreign Minister of Mexico, expressing such splendid appreciation of President Truman's honest tribute to bravery and courage wherever it may be found, cannot be added to. May we express the hope here today that no word or act of ours in the future shall ever detract from them!

THE PRESIDENTIAL TERM

The Senate resumed the consideration of the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 27), proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States relating to the terms of office of the President.

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, I respectfully ask that the clerk read the joint resolution to which I am about to address myself.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the clerk will read as requested.

The Chief Clerk read the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 27) as proposed to be amended, as follows:

Resolved, by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled (two-thirds of each House concurring therein), That the following article is hereby proposed as an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, which shall be valid to all intents and purposes as part of the Constitution when ratified by conventions in the several States, as provided in the Constitution.

"ARTICLE —

"SECTION 1. A person who has held the office of President, or acted as President, on 365 calendar days or more in each of two terms shall not be eligible to hold the office of President, or to act as President, for any part of another term; but this article shall not prevent any person who may be holding the office of President or acting as President during the term within which this article becomes operative from holding the office of President or acting as President during the remainder of such term.

"SEC. 2. This article shall be inoperative unless it shall have been ratified as an amendment to the Constitution by conventions in the several States, as provided in the Constitution, within 7 years from the date of its submission to the States by the Congress."

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, in view of the fact that my remarks will be brief, I respectfully request that I may pursue the tenor of my statement without interruption until I complete it, and then I shall be very happy to respond to any inquiry or any comments.

I should like to present the various reasons as I see them for enactment of the pending joint resolution; but before I do so, I should like to make this point:

RESOLUTION ABOVE PERSONALITIES

This resolution should be considered apart from discussion of the personality of the late President Roosevelt. It is not intended as a criticism of him, and prejudices for or against him should not be considered. We should be taking this step in terms of what the American people need in the future and should not be misled by bitter feelings of one kind or another of the past.

What are the reasons for this resolution? It might be noted at the outset that it has already been approved, in substance, on February 6 by a vote of 285 to 121 in the House of Representatives, including the favorable votes of 238 Republicans and 47 Democrats—22 percent of the total Democratic votes cast.

MAKING FORMAL AN AMERICAN CUSTOM

First. The resolution merely puts into writing in the Constitution a custom which the American people have observed throughout their history prior to President Roosevelt's tenure. This custom originated with the unforgettable Farewell Address of our first President, George Washington, on September 19, 1796, in which he stated his refusal to be a candidate for a third term.

DANGER OF DICTATORSHIP

Second. Too-long occupancy of the Presidential office and too-long continuance of the same administration always make for danger of dictatorship. Power corrupts even when it is in the hands of angels. I quote the words in 1932 of the late President Roosevelt himself, who, in turn, quoted President Calvin Coolidge, as follows:

For one reason or another, even a wisely led political party, given a long enough tenure of office, finally fails to express any longer the will of the people; and when it does so fail to express the will of the people, it ceases to be an effective instrument of government. It is far better for such a political party—and certainly better for the state—that it should be relegated to the role of the critic, and that the opposing political party should assume the reins of government. This condition appears to have arrived in America.

That is the statement of President Coolidge as quoted by President Roosevelt. Then Mr. Roosevelt went on to say:

That, my friends, is the sober conclusion of a cautious public man, not long ago President of the United States—Calvin Coolidge. With every word of it I heartily agree.

TEMPTATION TO OBTAIN ADDITIONAL TERMS

Third. If we do not enact this resolution, there will be constant temptation to Presidential incumbents to attempt to achieve a third and a fourth term.

EASE OF RENOMINATION OF INCUMBENT

Fourth. When any man occupies the Presidential office, there is always a certain reluctance in his party not to nominate him for another term. It is the President, of course, who is the head of his party, and who, through disposition of a large number of jobs, can win the allegiance of many members of the party. Thus, he has an inside track on nomination for a third and fourth term.

POSSIBLE CREATION OF EMERGENCIES BY INCUMBENT

Fifth. It has been argued that the people's hands should not be tied so that, in case of an emergency, a President can be reelected to office. This argument ignores the fact that a President can create an emergency and thus create reasons for his continuance in office.

We have found, too, that no civilian and no military man is indispensable in any emergency. Throughout the Second World War, we saw countless instances of commanders replaced without any adverse effect to the outcome of battles in any particular area.

STIMULATING MULTIPLE LEADERSHIP

Sixth. When we guarantee that no individual will occupy the Presidential office for more than two terms, we serve to encourage political leadership in other individuals. We assure a constant replacement of new blood into important positions in political parties. Every President always has with him a certain group of followers who tend to become smug and complacent in their positions when they, like the Chief Executive, occupy those positions too long. They tend to promote only their own cohorts and to freeze other leadership talent out.

Through this resolution, we will be helping to assure a full supply of constantly new talent for leadership of the Nation.

AMENDMENT OF HOUSE RESOLUTION

The resolution already enacted by the House of Representatives on this subject reads as follows:

Any person who has served as President of the United States during all or portions of any two terms shall thereafter be ineligible to hold the office of President. But this article shall not prevent any person who may hold the office of President during the term within which this article is ratified from holding such office for the remainder of such term.

Your Judiciary Committee, in its resolution, struck this language out and suggests to the Senate the following:

A person who has held the office of President, or acted as President, on 365 calendar days or more in each of two terms shall not be eligible to hold the office of President or to act as President for any part of another term; but this article shall not prevent any person who may be holding the office of President or acting as President during the term within which this article becomes operative from holding the ffice of President or acting as President during the remainder of such term.

Then there is another change in the Senate version. The Judiciary Committee struck out the language:

The legislatures of three-fourths of the several States—

And inserted—

Conventions in the several States as provided in the Constitution.

I, personally, had no particular desire to change the language of the House measure relating to ratification by the legislative branch of the States. But the committee felt that ratification by conventions was closer to the people. That, I believe, is a debatable question. At any rate, that is the provision in the Senate version.

I believe that the Senate should, with promptness and thoroughness, enact this limitation of Presidential tenure. In so doing, I believe that it will be expressing the will of the American people as indicated at the last election and it will be fulfilling the mandate given to the majority party. It will also be fulfilling the express intent of some of the great democratic leaders, as expressed in the past on the floor of the Senate.

I recommend the adoption of the Senate version of the resolution. Whatever differences of opinion may then exist can be ironed out in conference.

BREAKING OF TWO-TERM TRADITION

We will recall that when Mr. Roosevelt broke the long-term tradition by accepting the third-term nomination on July 19, 1940, he announced that he did so, "thinking solely of the national good," and because "it was my clear duty, with the aid of Congress, to preserve our neutrality." He said further, "No call of party alone would prevail upon me to accept reelection."

The debate over his action reflected debate which had raged a century and a half before at the Constitutional Convention in 1787. There were few subjects in the Convention that caused more controversy than the tenure and reeligibility for Presidential office. At one time, we remember that a draft of the Constitution called for a 7-year Presidential term.

THE ISSUE AT STAKE

Now, through this proposed twenty-second amendment to the Constitution, we can seal this long controversy. We can settle one of the fundamental issues which was left unsettled by the founders of the Republic. That issue is whether or not the principle of long-time continuance in office by so-called indispensable leaders—called by some the fuehrer-prinzip—is compatible with our Republican form of government. Jefferson, when he refused a third term, sensed the danger when he said:

No pretext should ever be permitted to dispense with it (he was referring to the principles of rotation in the Executive) because there will never be a time when real difficulties will not exist and furnish a plausible pretext for dispensation.

How well Jefferson read the future. In 1940, President Roosevelt's pretext was "clear duty to preserve our neutrality," and in 1944, he justified his fourth-term candidacy as necessary to defeat "those who opposed lend-lease" as unneutral.

We who contend for a two-term limitation recognize that it is necessary for the safety of the Republic. It is true that under the Senate resolution, one might hold office two terms and up to 364 days additional, or if he held office over 365 days he could only hold it for another term.

I repeat that I believe that, if there is any lesson to be learned from the past 20 years, it is that power in the hands of any man or group, if it remains there long enough, has a tendency to become dangerous to the general welfare.

CONCLUSION

Let us now, however, in unmistakable terms, indicate to one and to all that the American people reject the "fuehrer-prinzip." I respectfully urge the adoption of the resolution.

Mr. OVERTON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. WILEY. I yield.

Mr. OVERTON. First I wish to congratulate the able Senator from Wisconsin on the presentation of the proposed constitutional amendment.

Mr. WILEY. I thank the Senator.

Mr. OVERTON. I believe there is one point which the Senator failed to note. At the time of the adoption of the Constitution the power of the several States was greater than that of the Central Government, but in the course of time the power of the Central Government has become stronger than that of the States. The influence of the Chief Executive has grown with the increasing power of the National Government. It is therefore much more urgent now than it was at the time of the adoption of the Constitution, much more urgent now than at the time Washington declined a third term and Jefferson impliedly, at least, spoke against it, that there should be a limitation on the number of terms a President may serve. Otherwise, as the Senator has pointed out, we are likely to drift into an undemocratic form of government. If a President can succeed himself for an indefinite number of terms, the longer he stays in office the better position he is in to succeed himself.

Mr. WILEY. I thank the distinguished Senator. I think he has nailed down the thought I expressed when I stated that in these later days we have seen the development of the "fuehrer-prinzip," which is an autocratic concept—almost an international disease—which we have witnessed in the past 20 years. I recognize fully the increased necessity for this limitation for the very reason that the distinguished Senator has mentioned, which is that back in the early days of the Republic the States were really autonomous and had powers which since, because of world conditions probably, have been released to the Federal Government.

URGENT DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATIONS

Mr. BRIDGES and other Senators addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator yield, and if so, to whom?

Mr. WILEY. I yield to the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. BRIDGES. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the unfinished business be laid aside temporarily so that the Senate may take up the urgent deficiency bill which is on the calendar. I assume it will not take a long time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from New Hampshire that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside and that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill 1968, which will be stated by title?

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. A bill (H. R. 1968) making appropriations to supply urgent deficiencies in certain appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1947, and for other purposes.

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 1968) making appropriations to supply urgent deficiencies in certain appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1947, and for other purposes, which had been reported from the Committee on Appropriations with amendments.

Mr. BRIDGES. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the formal reading of the bill be dispensed with, that it be read for amendment, and that the amendments of the committee be first considered.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, will the Senator from New Hampshire yield to me for the purpose of suggesting the absence of a quorum?

Mr. BRIDGES. I yield.

Mr. LUCAS. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 6, after line 5, to insert:

OFFICE OF TEMPORARY CONTROLS

Salaries and expenses: For an additional amount, fiscal year 1947, for carrying out the functions of the Office of Price Administration transferred by Executive Order 9809 of December 12, 1946, to the Office of Temporary Controls, $7,991,815, which amount shall be merged with the funds transferred, pursuant to said Executive order, from the appropriation "Salaries and expenses," Office of Price Administration, in the Third Deficiency Appropriation Act, 1946. Funds transferred to the Office of Temporary Controls pursuant to Executive Order 9809 in connection with the transfer of functions by said Executive order shall be available for the payment of claims pursuant to part 2 of the Federal Tort Claims Act (Public Law 601, 79th Cong.) arising, respectively, from the activity concerned: Provided, That it is the intent of the Congress that all funds heretofore and herein appropriated shall be used to defray all expenses incident to the closing and liquidation of the Office of Price Administration and the Office of Temporary Controls by June 30, 1947.

Mr. TAYLOR. Mr President, I have sent to the desk an amendment to this provision. It is my understanding that the committee has increased the appropriation for the Office of Temporary Controls with the understanding that it be liquidated by June 30. As I understand, from talking to officials of the Office of Temporary Controls, that means that they will actually have to liquidate by April 30, because so much of the money appropriated will have to be expended to pay employees in the process of separating them from the bureau or agency.

Mr. President, the Office of Temporary Controls has a very important function which cannot be wound up at this time. I should like to mention some of the subjects which come under this particular bureau and the duties which they have been charged to perform. In effect, this committee amendment is intended to wind up the affairs of this agency, without the enactment by Congress of legislation designed actually to wind them up.

Let me state some of the duties of the Office of Temporary Controls. On June 30 the last payments will become due under the premium price plan for copper, lead, and zinc. Claims for those payments must be processed after July 1 by the Office of Temporary Controls. Government claims against violators of price regulations and orders must continue to be prosecuted. Such claims total approximately $75,000,000. In my estimation, Mr. President, it would be poor economy to do away with the machinery for prosecuting OPA violations, when the Government is likely to recover large sums of money because of clear-cut violations. The OPA and the OTC have dismissed the cases which they felt did not involve really severe violations of the regulations. Final audit of various subsidy operations now being carried on must be completed. Cost audits under the industrial alcohol program, under which the OPA priced sales of industrial alcohol to the DSC, must be completed. In the list from which I have been reading is a footnote which says, "Programs 3 and 4 also involve a saving to the Government of many million dollars."

The responsibilities imposed under section 17 of the Contract Settlement Act of 1944, the Tax Amortization Act, and the requisitioning acts must be carried to conclusion. In this connection, the OTC is presently preparing defenses in the case of some 117 claims against the Government, which involve a total sum of $13,800,000. Yet, Mr. President, we would order it to liquidate its affairs, with the result that it could not follow through on actions involving the recovery of vast sums of money for the Government.

On June 30 there will be thousands of cubic feet of heretofore active files to be disposed of in accordance with law and the policies of the National Archives.

On June 30 there will be permanent-status employees, now in the OTC, who under existing regulations must be carried on the pay rolls until the expiration of their annual leave, for their annual leave cannot be paid in a lump sum. There will be many employees in that category on June 30.

Mr. President, all my amendment does is to reduce the amount of the appropriation for the Office of Temporary Controls from $7,991,815 to $5,290,000, which I believe is the amount requested by the Office of Temporary Controls. That item is to be found on page 6, in line 11.

On the same page, in line 21, beginning with the word "Provided," my next amendment would strike out all down to and including the figure "1947," in line 25. The proviso thus stricken out is the one calling for liquidation of the Office of Temporary Controls by June 30. As I have already pointed out, such a requirement would really mean its liquidation by April 30.

When we come to a later place in the bill, I shall offer another amendment; but all of these are really tied together, because the same thing would be done to the OPA.

So I ask that the first amendment which I have offered be read at this time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment to the committee amendment will be stated.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. In the committee amendment on page 6, in line 11, it is proposed to strike out "$7,991,815," and to insert in lieu thereof "$5,290,000."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Idaho to the committee amendment.

Mr. HILL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. TAYLOR. I yield.

Mr. HILL. I wish to ask the Senator from Idaho whether his amendment affects the CPA, the Civilian Production Administration.

Mr. TAYLOR. I do not know whether it is under the Office of Temporary Controls. It has to do, has it not, with controls over buildings?

Mr. HILL. Yes; it does.

Mr. TAYLOR. I know that such controls are affected. They will go out the window. The veterans' housing program will no longer be controlled.

Mr. HILL. The Senator from Idaho has mentioned the very thing in which I am interested, and in which I know he likewise is interested. I am extremely concerned, as I am sure all other Members of the Senate are, about veterans' housing, about the present terrific shortage of housing, and about the situation which now confronts our veterans under which they are not able to obtain housing and are unable to provide anything like proper or decent shelter for themselves and their families. Thousands of them find themselves in that situation.

As we know, the Civilian Production Administration has promulgated a regulation known as VHP–1, under which it has controlled the amount of materials which go each month into commercial and industrial construction. What I fear is that if we strike down all regulations and all controls under the CPA, there will be no materials to go into veterans' housing, and all materials will go into commercial and industrial construction. Of course, as we know, there is no rent control on commercial and industrial property, and the commercial and industrial property operators can and will pay more for materials than the veterans can afford to pay.

So I wish to ask the Senator from Idaho whether our action today, if we adopt the committee amendment, will make it even more difficult, if not impossible, for our veterans to get the housing they so desperately need.

Mr. TAYLOR. It will make it absolutely impossible to carry on even our present inadequate housing program.

Mr. HILL. In other words, what we are doing now for housing will fail, if we pass this bill with the amendment which has been submitted by the committee. Is that the judgment of the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. TAYLOR. On April 30 there will be no machinery left to enforce any building materials priorities allocations. Operators then will be able to start building anything they please. That will mean the end of the veterans' housing program and the end of the construction of medium-cost housing, for at that time the actual situation will be that nothing but mansions will be able to be built, and they are all the houses that will be built until such time as the market for mansions is saturated.

Mr. HILL. In other words, it will mean that the veterans will have to take the hindmost, and actually there will not be any hindmost; is that correct?

Mr. TAYLOR. That is correct.

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Arizona?

Mr. TAYLOR. I yield.

Mr. HAYDEN. I wish to make a point of order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Idaho yield for that purpose?

Mr. TAYLOR. I do.

Mr. HAYDEN. I make the point of order that the proviso beginning in line 21, on page 6, reading as follows: "Provided, That it is the intent of the Congress that all funds heretofore and herein appropriated shall be used to defray all expenses incident to the closing and liquidation of the Office of Price Administration and the Office of Temporary Controls by June 30, 1947," is legislation on an appropriation bill, which is prohibited by rule XVI, section 2, reading as follows:

The Committee on Appropriations shall not report an appropriation bill containing amendments proposing new or general legislation.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair suggests that the point of order is not in order until the pending amendment, relating to a previous section of the bill, is disposed of.

Mr. HAYDEN. I thought a point of order was in order at any time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Not in the judgment of the Chair, when the point of order is raised with respect to a portion of the bill which is not pending before the Senate.

The question now is on agreeing to the amendment submitted by the Senator from Idaho to the committee amendment, which has been stated.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. TAYLOR. I yield.

Mr. LUCAS. Let me inquire of the Senator from Arizona if the point of order as the Senator from Arizona has suggested it, is sustained as to this particular portion of the committee amendment, would not that accomplish the same result which the Senator from Idaho seeks to accomplish by his amendment to the committee amendment?

Mr. HAYDEN. Yes. If I may discuss the question for a moment, let me say that, in the judgment of the majority of the committee, the appropriations contained in the bill as it was reported would be sufficient to pay the terminal leave and to allow the Office of Temporary Controls to operate until the 30th of June; but that simply cannot be done with the amount of money provided if liquidation is required according to the terms of the proviso. That is why I should like to have the proviso stricken out.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair suggests that if the Senator from Idaho is willing to withdraw his pending amendment temporarily, and ask for the submission of his other amendment, the matter might be before the Senate.

Mr. TAYLOR. Mr. President, it is agreeable to me that that be done.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question then is on the second amendment submitted by the Senator from Idaho, proposing to strike out the proviso at the bottom of page 6. The Senator from Arizona is recognized on the point of order.

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. President, it appears clearly to me that this is legislation on an appropriation bill. It states "That it is the intent of the Congress that all funds heretofore and herein appropriated shall be used to defray all expenses incident to the closing and liquidation of the Office of Price Administration and the Office of Temporary Controls by June 30, 1947."

It is either legislation or it is merely the expression of a pious hope. In any event, it has a legislative effect, and if it has a legislative effect, if it is binding upon anybody, it is not in order on the pending bill.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is prepared to rule. The Senator from Oklahoma is recognized.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, I submitted this proviso in the Committee on Appropriations. History has shown for a long time that governmental bureaus, when once created, never end their tasks voluntarily. I think recent events have convinced many people that the OPA should be terminated as soon as possible. I think it is generally agreed that OPA will not be continued after June 30, 1947.

In order to serve notice on what remains of the OPA that they will be expected to use the funds already available and the funds herein appropriated to close up their affairs by June 30, the provision is inserted. It is not legislation; it is a limitation upon the money they now have and a limitation upon the money appropriated in the pending bill, and it was so intended.

Mr. BRIDGES. Mr. President, I desire to say a word on the point of order. I do not think the provision is subject to a point of order, for the reasons outlined by the distinguished Senator from Oklahoma.

There is already on the statute books legislation terminating OPA as of June 30, 1947. This provision in no way legislates. All it does is establish the conditions for carrying out a law already on the statute books.

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. President, will the Senator from New Hampshire yield?

Mr. BRIDGES. Certainly.

Mr. HAYDEN. Until the 30th of June OPA will be performing its normal functions as to rent control and sugar rationing, with the necessary force, and then, when the 30th of June comes about, under the law all that activity will cease, and we will proceed after that date to liquidate the agency. The intent of the amendment is that the liquidation shall take place now, and that is wherein it changes the existing law.

Mr. BRIDGES. The intent of Congress when it passed the original law, which is legislation, was to end OPA on June 30, 1947. All the proviso does is to prescribe the conditions under which the legislation shall be carried out, and in my view it is not legislation on an appropriation bill.

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. President, will the Senator from New Hampshire yield?

Mr. BRIDGES. I yield to the Senator from Florida.

Mr. PEPPER. So that we may have no ambiguity in our minds about what the facts are and what the intention of the committee is in respect to this matter, first let me ask, if this proviso remains in the committee amendment, what will be its effect upon the present allocation of materials, so that the temporary controls agency will allocate a certain limited quantity of materials weekly to nonresidential construction, and the like?

Mr. BRIDGES. It will force OPA to carry on its activities between now and June 30 with reduced personnel; it will have to reduce drastically. There is no question about that. It will be able to carry on its work with reduced personnel until June 30, the date set by Congress for the ending of OPA.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair would like to suggest that the merits of the amendment are not at the moment under discussion. There is a point of order to be settled. Is the Senator speaking on the point of order?

Mr. PEPPER. I will say, Mr. President, that it seems to me, if I may say so, that the point of order made by the Senator from Arizona is well taken.

It has been noted in the press, and has been generally the subject of comment, that Congress is practically going to destroy, by indirection, for example, the rent-control program. I think it is a fairer and a better method of legislating for the Congress to say in so many words what it purposes to do. If we are to destroy rent control, we have a right to do that. It might or might not be good public policy to do it, but we should do it in such a way that those who vote to do it know that that is what they are voting, that those who oppose it will know how they are voting, and that the public will know how we are all voting.

When such an item is contained in provisions like those before us, it is difficult for Senators to understand what the exact effect of their votes will be, and it is hard for the public to understand the effect of our votes. It certainly seems to me that the point of order is well taken, that this is an indirect way of doing what the Congress, under the rules, is expected to do directly.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question on which the Chair is about to rule, of course, has nothing to do with the merits of the amendment.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, the proviso reads:

> That it is the intent of the Congress that all funds heretofore and herein appropriated shall be used to defray all expenses incident to the closing and liquidation of the Office of Price Administration and the Office of Temporary Controls by June 30, 1947.

I ask the Senator from New Hampshire whether that includes the item of accrued annual leave, which amounts to $7,000,000.

Mr. BRIDGES. Yes. I do not desire to go into the merits.

Mr. LUCAS. My only reason for asking the question is that if it does include the $7,000,000, it seems to me definitely to be legislation on an appropriation bill.

Mr. BRIDGES. Let me say for the benefit of the Senator from Illinois that I attempted to explain the matter, and if I may take a moment to answer the Senator's question, I shall proceed.

As the bill came to the Senate, the House had eliminated an item of between five and six million dollars, an appropriation which had been asked for, and also made a rescission of $9,000,000,000. So that if the House figure had been adhered to, OPA would have ceased to exist on February 28, or March the 1st, one of those two dates. However, the House provided no sum for liquidation of OPA nor did it include provision for terminal-leave pay which is a direct obligation on the Federal Government. The two items of $7,000,000 and $6,000,000 make approximately $13,000,000 in round figures. What the Senate did was restore the rescission of nine million and give $7,991,815 more, which would pay the accrued terminal leave of all employees, amounting roughly to $7,000,000; it would pay all the liquidating expense, about $6,000,000 more, and then with the difference between, roughly thirteen million and seventeen million, the OPA could operate during the next 4 months, of course with reduced personnel. So the organization as established by law would be continued to June 30; but it would have to cut down its expenditures drastically in the next 4 months, which would involve a reduction in personnel. So far as I can see, there is no reason why there should not be such a reduction because OPA has been overstaffed and has not retrenched in proportion to the decrease in its duties. To my way of thinking, this is the orderly way of bringing about a desirable result, rather than by following the original request of OPA, or concurring in the action by the House. I think that is a fair explanation.

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. BRIDGES. Certainly.

Mr. PEPPER. It is pertinent, Mr. President, in determining whether the point of order is well taken to know what is the intention of the Appropriations Committee in proposing the proviso. If its effect is simply to indicate to the Senate that only a limited amount of money will be appropriated, and we know that the amount appropriated will not be sufficient to enable the agency to discharge a legal obligation imposed upon it by statute, namely, to perform certain functions, so that the proviso has no effect in law, then it might not be subject to a point of order; but if it has the effect in law of impairing the validity of the statute under which the OPA is now administered, either as to date of termination or as to impairment of function, it would seem to me that the point of order would be well taken, because that would be legislation, and that is why I think the intention of the committee is very pertinent to the consideration of the subject.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is prepared to rule, and the Chair prefers to rule before there is further debate on the merits of the matter, because the Chair does not wish his decision to be confused with any conclusion as to the merits of the question .

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, will the Chair permit me to make a remark or two about the point of order, not about the merits?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Certainly.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I should like to invite the attention of the Chair to the language of the proviso, in line 22. I am calling attention particularly to the use of the word "heretofore." The language reads:

Provided, That it is the intent of the Congress that all funds heretofore and herein appropriated shall be used to defray all expenses incident to the closing and liquidation of the Office—

And so forth. The word "heretofore," as I see it, is purely legislative language, because if this proviso will have any effect at all it will have the effect of placing a restriction upon the very appropriation that has heretofore been made, wherever it has been made, however it has been made, and whatever the intention of Congress was in making it. It is clear to me, therefore, that this language is subject to the point of order.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, just one additional word. The last Congress made an appropriation to carry on the OPA activities until June 30, 1947. The OPA is not able to carry on its work, apparently, with the appropriations made last year. The OPA, or its successor, is asking for funds with which to operate until June 30, 1947.

The proviso was intended to serve notice on what remains of the OPA structure, and its successor, that only the funds already appropriated and the funds appropriated in the pending bill shall be available for the closing of their office, and that after June 30, 1947, there will be no funds from any source available to that agency. If that is not a notice to them to close up by June 30, then I do not know what a notice could be; and that was the intent of the proviso.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair states again that his ruling has no bearing whatever upon the merits of the argument. The sole question is whether the proviso in lines 21–25, on page 6, is general legislation on an appropriation bill.

The Chair very respectfully disagrees with both the Senator from New Hampsire and the Senator from Arizona; the former, in respect to his interpretation of the effect of the proviso; the latter, therefore, in respect to its eligibility. In the Chair's opinion, this is not legislation at all; it is what the Senator from Arizona described as a "pious wish." In the Chair's opinion it is purely an expression of intent, which is not binding or of legal effect in any aspect. It is a completely novel method of trying to limit appropriations without using the usual limitations form.

Since it is, therefore, nothing, in the Chair's view, except an expression of intent, the Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. President, then I am to understand, so far as the ruling of the Chair is concerned, that no official of the Government is required, under this language, to pay any attention to it?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will have to let the Senator from Arizona put his own interpretation upon the ruling of the Chair. I think it is very obvious what the interpretation is.

Mr. HAYDEN. If the language is without legal effect, it is not law, it is merely, as I have stated, the expression of a pious wish. If I were an administrator I would say, "I intend to carry out the intent of the Congress, which I shall do." But to do that, the OPA would have to be closed up on the 30th of April. It is utterly impossible to carry out this direction and do the things that are necessary to be done. That is my judgment, based upon as careful a study as I can make with respect to the proposal.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair can make his viewpoint perhaps even clearer by indicating what in his judgment would be the usual and traditional form in which a proviso of this character could be inserted. If it were to have teeth, it would read as follows:

Provided, That no part of the funds herein appropriated shall be used after June 30, 1947, to defray any expenses incident to the closing and liquidation of the Office of Price Administration and the Office of Temporary Controls.

That would be the usual form; it would be in order; it would be effective.

Mr. HAYDEN. There is no question about that.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair repeats, the proviso as it appears in the bill does not have legal effect in achieving the result which is expressed in the form of an intent.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, I listened carefully to what the Chair has just said in restating the language of this proviso in what he termed to be the parliamentary and proper form.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Provided there is a desire to reach the objective which is expressed.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Precisely; and I was very much interested to note that in so stating the correct form of the language, the Chair omitted the word "heretofore."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Wyoming is totally correct. The word "heretofore," if this were a proviso that had any legal effect, would certainly make the proviso out of order.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. So, therefore, Mr. President, if I may say so, we are in the position, that although the Chair ruled that the use of the word "heretofore" in a limitation of the kind that he has stated renders it subject to the point of order, the use of that word in this expression of intent does not subject it to the point of order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Wyoming is entirely correct. The Chair's ruling hangs completely upon the first five words, that this is an expression of intent—an entirely unique situation.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. From what the Chair has said, officials of the executive branch who are in charge of the administration of appropriations heretofore made are now on notice by the language used by the Presiding Officer of the Senate, that the language of the proviso does not affect such appropriations so made.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair again says to the Senator from Wyoming and to the Senator from Arizona that each may put his own interpretation on the ruling of the Chair; which it seems to the Chair is completely lucid and obvious.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. HAYDEN. I yield.

Mr. LUCAS. In a clear-cut opinion the Chair has decided the point of order. I agree with the distinguished occupant of the chair that the language of the proviso does not mean a single thing other than to express a pious hope or wish and it seems to me that the Senate should not undertake to legislate in such a manner. I submit, however, with all due deference to the Committee on Appropriations that the officials of the OPA should not be placed in such a position as they would be placed if the proviso were adopted. I hope the able Senator from New Hampshire, as chairman of the Appropriations Committee, will withdraw the proviso from the bill in view of the careful and conscientious ruling of the Chair.

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. President, if I may interrupt, I should like to make the same suggestion for the reason that what the committee intended to do is clearly set forth in the report of the committee. The committee states in its report:

> The committee expects OPA by a drastic reduction in its personnel and the practice of other economies to continue its programs until June 30, and make provision for the payment of terminal leave and other liquidation activities within the sum of $7,991,815 proposed.

That really tells what the committee had in mind. The amendment was adopted as an afterthought. Its meaning is not clear; its meaning can be strained in any way which may be desired. That is not true of the report of the committee, which would be equally binding upon the officials of the OPA, for the rule is that if either a House or Senate committee report indicates how money is to be spent, Congress expects it to be spent in that way. I cannot see much sound sense in permitting to remain in the bill a provision which was adopted hastily, without due consideration, and which seems to involve two conflicting ideas or proposals. What the committee has suggested in its report and what the proviso suggests cannot all be done within the same space of time.

Mr. BRIDGES. Mr. President, the issue is very clear. The Congress of the United States by legislation has said that OPA should be terminated on June 30, 1947. The OPA originally submitted a request to the House committee for a certain sum of money to enable it to continue until June 30, and at the end of June 30 OPA would still have owed its employees their terminal leave. So it is probable that by that time the amount needed for terminal leave would be in excess of $8,000,000, and OPA would still have need for liquidating expenses in the amount of between five million and six million dollars, representing by that time a total of thirteen million or fourteen million dollars. The House in its wisdom provided for a rescission of $9,000,000 of the funds of OPA, and stopped further appropriations summarily, thus cutting off OPA on March 1 or February 28.

Mr. President, the weakness of the position of the House committee in its desire to discontinue the activities of OPA lies in the fact that the terminal leave of the thirteen or fourteen thousand workers in OPA is an obligation of the Federal Government which Congress cannot escape paying. It is necessary also to provide for cancellation of leases and other matters. If OPA were to continue after June 30, it would have to have roughly thirteen or fourteen million dollars for that purpose, or if the Senate were to do what the House did, it would be necessary to provide the money now for that purpose. The Senate Appropriations Committee did neither. After hearing about these things, the committee said, "We are going to live up to the intent of Congress to terminate OPA by June 30. We are not going to stop its operations now. Therefore we restore the rescission of $9,000,000 and we give OPA $7,991,815." This will enable OPA to do three things:

First. OPA may pay its employees terminal leave, which is a solemn obligation of the Federal Government.

Second. OPA may pay all its liquidating expenses.

Third. OPA may continue on a very much reduced scale, with a greatly decreased number of personnel.

We have heard much said in recent days to the effect that all Members of Congress are for economy. The Senate Appropriations Committee believes that OPA can carry on the very limited duties it has to perform, with a reduced force. Therefore we provide money for OPA to do so.

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. President, if I am correctly advised, it is costing now about $5,000,000 a month for the pay roll.

Mr. BRIDGES. That is correct.

Mr. HAYDEN. And the proposal which has been reported by the committee is that OPA shall have less than a million dollars a month.

Mr. BRIDGES. I would say not less than a million dollars, but a little more than a million dollars a month.

Mr. HAYDEN. Yes; but that would mean that OPA would have to make an 80-percent reduction in their personnel.

Mr. BRIDGES. With one change. The Senator knows that the $5,000,000 or $6,000,000 to be used for liquidation purposes includes personnel expense.

Mr. HAYDEN. What I have in mind is that in the enforcement of rent control and the continuance of sugar rationing OPA would be required to operate in those fields with a reduction of 80 percent in their force because of the limited amount of money they would have with which to operate.

Mr. BRIDGES. That is roughly correct.

Mr. HAYDEN. I have grave doubt whether OPA can administer rent control and sugar rationing with an 80-percent reduction in personnel.

Mr. BRIDGES. That is an open question; it is a matter of opinion; but it is the judgment of the majority of the committee that the few remaining functions of OPA could be carried on with a considerably reduced personnel. I think OPA can perform its remaining functions with a considerably reduced personnel. I do not think a considerable cut in its personnel would hurt. Congress must determine whether rent control shall be continued, and if so, what agency shall have rent control in charge. Congress must determine whether sugar rationing shall continue until June 30, and if so, whether the Department of Agriculture shall have charge of sugar rationing or what agency of Government shall administer it. In the meantime, the committee proposal provides for, first, the fulfillment of the obligations of government; second, liquidation of OPA; and, third, the continuation of the orderly processes of OPA, but with a very drastically reduced personnel force. That is what I am for; that is what the majority of the committee favored.

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. President, the way the chairman of the committee states the proposition he is in total disagreement with the officials of the Office of Temporary Controls in this respect, namely, according to their statement, that if they are to enforce rent control, if they are to enforce sugar rationing, they must have an adequate force with which to do the work, and the minute they cease to have an adequate force, then they must stop. That was the proposal by OPA, that if Congress wanted to cut it off, very well, do so, but advance the date. If I myself were operating the agency I would want to carry it on satisfactorily, and not in a haphazard way. Take rent control, for example. Sufficient money is not provided in the appropriation to pay terminal leave and to pay the cost of liquidation. Under such circumstances, obviously, OPA cannot administer the rent control throughout the United States. If I were the Administrator, it would be my obligation to say "Very well, we will discontinue rent control in Pittsburgh. We will carry it on in Kansas City." That is all that could be done. It could not be administered successfully all over the United States with the amount of money that is contained in the bill. If I were Administrator I would not try to do so.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New Hampshire has the floor. Does the Senator from New Hampshire yield to the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. BRIDGES. I yield to the Senator from Wyoming.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I desire to suggest to the Senator from New Hampshire that the statement he made just a moment ago is a complete demonstration of the great danger which is involved in this amendment. If I understood him correctly, the Senator from New Hampshire stated that the purpose of this amendment is to make sure that OPA is cut off by June 30. Another amendment will cut off CPA on the 30th of June, regardless of what happens.

Mr. BRIDGES. That is what the law on the statute books requires.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. That is correct.

Mr. BRIDGES. All we are doing, for the first time, or one of the few times in history, is proceeding to carry out the provisions of the law and finally end a governmental agency.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. The Senator refers to the fact that rent control, sugar control, and veterans' housing are involved in the action which we take here today. I speak as one who in the last Congress, as chairman of a subcommittee of the Committee on the Judiciary, brought before the Senate a bill extending the War Powers Act in certain respects. That bill, as approved by the Judiciary Committee, cut off the power of the President under the War Powers Act with respect to more than half of the titles contained in the original act, but allowed certain war powers to remain because of the conviction that it was necessary to have those powers in order properly to carry on reconversion. There was no disposition on the part of the Judiciary Committee or on the part of the Congress, when the extension bill was passed, to do anything but cut the war powers as rapidly as they could be safely cut and still preserve the public interest.

As a result of the language in this bill, before Congress has acted and determined what it wishes to do with respect to rent control; before Congress has had an opportunity to decide what it wants to do with respect to the rationing of sugar; before Congress has had an opportunity to decide in a legislative manner what should be done with respect to veterans' housing, the Appropriations Committee is coming into the picture with a provision which would cause those activities to be terminated almost immediately.

Mr. BRIDGES. Mr. President, the Senator has given a wholly ambiguous picture. The law now provides that the OPA shall end on June 30. All we are doing is complying with the law. If the Senator has any quarrel, it is with the previous Congress.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, will the Senator further yield?

Mr. BRIDGES. I yield.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. The trouble is, not that we are saying that the OPA shall terminate on the 30th of June 1947, which has already been said by the Congress; but that we are putting into the appropriation bill, by the provision under discussion, language which will result, not in termination on June 30th, but in termination almost immediately. Thereby we shall be interfering with the express intent of Congress that rent control, sugar control, and veterans' housing shall be carried on until the Congress, by legislative action, shall undertake to do otherwise.

If the Senator will bear with me just a moment, I know how earnest he is in his desire to cut off OPA. No one knows better than I—because I have protested against it many times—how some of the agents of OPA, by improper public relations, have caused the demand for its immediate elimination. I have complained about that publicly and privately. But what I am saying to the Senate is this: If sugar rationing comes to an end as the result of this action by the Appropriations Committee, the public will suffer. Those who are engaged in the raising of sugar beets in this country will suffer. Those who are engaged in the raising of sugarcane in continental United States will suffer. The consumers of sugar will suffer, and more particularly the householders, because they will be deprived of the protection——

Mr. BRIDGES. Mr. President, I decline to yield further. The Senator is wholly in error.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for one or two questions?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, I shall take the opportunity to discuss the question in my own time.

Mr. BRIDGES. I yield to the Senator from Oklahoma.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Is it not a fact that if rent control is extended it will require additional legislation, and additional funds will have to be made available after June 30, 1947?

Mr. BRIDGES. That is true.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. If rent control is to be continued, will it not require legislation and appropriations to carry on the program after June 30, 1947?

Mr. BRIDGES. That is true.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. One further question. Is it not a fact that if this amendment is agreed to it will in all probability save the Treasury money?

Mr. BRIDGES. It will.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. If we do not express our intent, this organization will be intact on June 30, to the extent of tens of thousands of employees who will have to be taken care of. That will cost the Treasury money. If this is a money-saving amendment, I ask this question: Will not the amount of money saved help to balance the budget?

Mr. BRIDGES. It will.

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BRIDGES. I yield.

Mr. HAYDEN. Can the Senator guarantee to the Senate that rent control will be continued and enforced as it now is, and as effectively as it is now enforced, without change throughout the United States, with the amount of money in this bill?

Mr. BRIDGES. The only difference is that it will be done at less cost to the Government.

Mr. HAYDEN. Is the Senator satisfied that we can reduce personnel in connection with rent control throughout the United States and do the job just as effectively with less money? Can it be done with an 80-percent cut?

Mr. BRIDGES. My answer is "Yes." I am for rent control. I always have been. Today I am for rent control. But there is no excuse in the world for the number of employees in the various agencies of the Government. The Senator well remembers the discussion on this subject. The figures which we use are the agency's own figures for continuation of its work in full force until April 30.

Mr. HAYDEN. That is correct. The agency can carry on in full force up to April 30. If I were an administrator conscientiously attempting to enforce an act of Congress, I would want to execute the law in the proper way; and if I could not do it I would quit.

Mr. BRIDGES. Representatives of the agency stated that it could carry on in full force with the present personnel. I say that they can start reducing their force now, and with a greatly reduced force perform the duties which are now entrusted to them, and that the job can be done as effectively at lower cost, and with drastically reduced personnel.

Mr. HAYDEN. Let me illustrate how I think this provision would work. Let us assume that there is an office in Boston which is very effectively administering rent control with a certain number of employees. Congress directs that liquidation shall take place. A liquidating official of the OPA walks into the Boston office and says to the rent-control administrator in Boston, "I am sorry, but we are canceling the lease on the building which you now occupy. I must have your desk. I am going to sell it as surplus; and, as required under the law, your records must go to the Archives."

The man administering rent control in Boston might very properly say, "How am I to carry on?" The liquidating officer might say to him, "I do not know how you are going to do it, but you will have no office, no desk, and no papers. You will be out of business, because we are required to liquidate, and we cannot do it on the last day of June. We must start now, and I am starting in Boston."

So rent control in Boston would be at an end the minute we liquidated that office. That is what would happen all over the United States. The problem cannot be handled in that way. We cannot have rent control under the terms of the proviso which we are now debating, and it ought to go out of the bill for that reason.

Mr. BRIDGES. A start could be made by eliminating this office and that office, and gradually the number of offices would be reduced and the number of personnel would be reduced without affecting duties or jobs. The difficulty is apparent. The Senator from Arizona and others Senators on the other side of the aisle—notably the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. O'MAHONEY]—present their case very ably. But the Senator from Wyoming made the statement a little while ago that what is proposed will ruin the sugar-beet farmers and other producers throughout the country. That is not an accurate statement. I do not think the Senator wants to convey that impression. This will not ruin anyone. Business will be conducted with a reduced personnel. One can go into any OPA office in the country and find officials falling over each other. It is not the number of individuals in an office which determines the efficiency of the office. A wrong idea on that score is projected into the minds of many people as the result of the years which we have been through. It is the wrong gage.

Mr. HAYDEN. The Senator's proposal calls for an 80-percent reduction in the number of personnel. I am unable to understand how an agency can operate as efficiently with 20 percent of its force, and give the public as good service.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BRIDGES. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. During the discussion of the budget and the consideration of other matters since the Congress met, the statement has been made that one can go into any Government building anywhere in the United States and find employees falling over one another; and the Senator from New Hampshire reiterates that statement today.

Mr. BRIDGES. That is correct.

Mr. BARKLEY. I should like to ask the Senator if he can point to any Government office in Washington or elsewhere in which he has seen any employee falling over another employee, or any number of employees, in the offices to which he has general reference; and, if so, whether he can tell us who it was that fell over whom, why he fell over him, and what happened to both of them when one fell over the other. It seems to me that we should have some concrete evidence of this falling-over process if we are compelled to listen to it all the time.

Mr. BRIDGES. I am delighted that the Senator from Kentucky desires to lighten the debate by injecting a little humor into it.

Mr. BARKLEY. No; I beg the Senator's pardon.

Mr. BRIDGES. I used the expression "falling over each other" as a figure of speech. I am sure that if they did not watch themselves very carefully it actually would have occurred.

Mr. BARKLEY. Where would it have occurred?

Mr. BRIDGES. In practically every Government office in Washington.

Mr. BARKLEY. That is a general statement. Can the Senator name one office in which it might have occurred?

Mr. BRIDGES. The OPA, for one.

Mr. BARKLEY. In what division was it?

Mr. BRIDGES. I shall not specify.

Mr. BARKLEY. The Senator refuses to get down to offering proof of what he has been talking about.

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me for a moment?

Mr. BRIDGES. I yield.

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. It so happens that about 4 days ago a Democratic appointee on one of the prominent commissions in the Government and who has held office for about 2 months as a member of the commission made the statement—and I hope the Senator from Kentucky will pardon me if I do not mention the man's name——

Mr. BARKLEY. That is just the trouble. We hear general statements to the effect that somebody told somebody else, who heard it through a third person, that somebody fell over somebody in some department.

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. I am trying to contribute to the kaleidoscopic domino-row knocking-down discussion by furnishing information.

Mr. BARKLEY. The Senator always contributes information in any discussion in which he participates, but I am somewhat curious to get down to names, places, and cases, because I am as much opposed to anybody falling over anybody else as is the Senator from Iowa or the Senator from New Hampshire. I want to protect the victims of the falling-over process, if it is going on. I should like to have the name of one person in one office, anywhere, who was hurt or who fell over somebody else by reason of this supernumerosity of officers and employees.

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield so that I may stumble along in the falling-over process?

Mr. BARKLEY. I hope the Senator will not fall over me.

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. I am sure that anyone who has ever collided with the distinguished Senator from Kentucky has done so to his own detriment and injury. But I will say that a few days ago the man to whom I have referred, who came to Washington a few months ago, made the statement that he had accepted his commission of appointment, that he had been going religiously to his office, and that, so far as he was able to determine, in the 2 months he had been employed there, no member of the commission had anything to do. His private secretary had nothing to do. The employees, sitting around in large numbers, had nothing to do.

I give that incident as an illustration. I shall not reveal the man's name.

Mr. BARKLEY. Will the Senator tell us what agency or commission it is?

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. I do not wish to identify the commission.

Mr. BARKLEY. It seems to me that if there is a member of any commission who is so disturbed by the fact that he has nothing to do and that nobody in his commission has anything to do, instead of going around privately and whispering it into the ear of the Senator from Iowa or some other Senator, he ought to be frank enough to come before the proper Senate committee and ask that his job be abolished. I am not willing to protect anybody against knowledge of his identity if he is refusing to divulge to a committee—the Appropriations Committee or any other committee—the information which he seems to have divulged to the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. I will say that this particular man did not suggest appearing before any committee of the Senate, although it was suggested to him that it would be very helpful if he should do so; but he did say that he was seriously considering resigning.

Mr. BARKLEY. He has not yet resigned, has he?

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. Not that I know of.

Mr. BARKLEY. Does any part of this appropriation affect the commission of which he is a member?

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. I do not think I had better identify the commission.

Mr. BARKLEY. If there is such an item in this bill, will the Senator offer an amendment on the floor to eliminate it?

Mr. BRIDGES. I shall take care of that. My amendment will eliminate the danger of anyone falling over anyone else in the OPA. All the Senator has to do is to support the committee amendment.

Mr. BARKLEY. That is not exactly the situation. I want to look into the committee amendment. I do not know any more now than I did when I started.

Mr. DWORSHAK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BRIDGES. I yield.

Mr. DWORSHAK. I might suggest for the information of the majority leader——

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, a point of order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator will state it.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. For the past three quarters of an hour the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BRIDGES] has been standing in his place farming out the time of the Senate in the discussion of the question which is pending. No Senator is permitted to talk except by leave of the Senator from New Hampshire; and if any Senator says something to which the Senator from New Hampshire objects, he pulls the string and says that he does not desire to yield further. I suggest, Mr. President, that if the Senator from New Hampshire does not have some remarks of his own to make, he should yield the floor and let those of us who desire to speak upon this subject do so in our own time. I think the rule is being violated.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Under the rules of the Senate the Senator can yield only for a question. The rule ordinarily is given very wide latitude as a matter of courtesy. The Senator from Wyoming was the chief beneficiary of this courtesy. If it is desired by the Senate that there shall be no courtesy, the Chair will be delighted to proceed accordingly.

Does the Senator from New Hampshire yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. BRIDGES. I yield.

Mr. DWORSHAK. I was about to observe that if the minority leader will read the monthly report issued by the United States Civil Service Commission showing how many Federal employees there are on the civilian pay roll of the Government he will see that there are now at least twice as many civilian employees as there were immediately prior to Pearl Harbor. If there is justifiable reason to employ all of that personnel now, one must reach the conclusion that it takes two persons to do one job. In view of the fact that hostilities have ceased and at least in part the wartime emergency has terminated, I think it is reasonable for the legislative branch of the Government to demand that the appropriations which are made to pay the salaries of employees in the executive departments and agencies shall be used economically and judiciously, and I think the time has come when we should demand that each employee render a full day's service for each full day's pay.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. BRIDGES. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. I do not wish to violate the rule which has recently been announced, so as to bring down upon my head an obiter dictum, ex cathedra ruling of the Chair; but I should like to ask the Senator from Idaho a question, namely, whether by his reference to the Civil Service Commission he intimates that I can obtain from that Commission the information I am seeking as to what office or agency is overstaffed or in what building or what agency employees are falling over one another.

Mr. DWORSHAK. Yes.

Mr. BARKLEY. We all know that there are more Government employees now than there were before the war. We do not have to read the reports of the Civil Service Commission in order to know that. But I ask whether the Civil Service Commission's reports, issued each month, indicate the number of employees which that Commission thinks should be eliminated.

Mr. DWORSHAK. The monthly reports of the Civil Service Commission indicate that in practically every bureau and agency of the Government there are approximately twice as many Government employees now as there were prior to Pearl Harbor. Obviously, if there is the same amount of work to be done, twice as many employees should not be required to do it.

Mr. BARKLEY. Of course, Mr. President, there is much more work to be done now than there was before Pearl Harbor. We shall have a much larger budget, regardless of the particular amount which is finally arrived at by the Congress. Does the Senator from Idaho mean to intimate by his inquiry that the activities of a Government which has a budget of approximately $35,000,000,000 can be carried on with the same number of employees that the Government had prior to Pearl Harbor, when the total Government budget was much smaller?

Mr. DWORSHAK. I think substantial reductions in the number of employees can be effected by most departments and agencies of the Government. If the Senator will read the reports filed by the so-called Byrd committee, he will find in them an indication that there can be an immediate curtailment of the Federal pay rolls.

Mr. BARKLEY. I think I have been as diligent as my time and circumstances permit in reading all the reports; but I thank the Senator from Idaho for calling them to my attention.

Mr. DWORSHAK. I am glad to render that service.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. BRIDGES. I yield.

Mr. MYERS. I do not wish to violate the recent ruling of the Chair; but in view of the Chair's prior ruling on the point of order made by the Senator from Arizona, it occurs to me that it might be well to observe that the Seventy-eighth Congress was known as the War Congress, and the Seventy-ninth Congress was known as the Victory Congress, and probably the Eightieth Congress will be known as the Congress of Pious Wishes and New Year's Resolutions.

Mr. BRIDGES. Mr. President, inasmuch as there has been considerable discussion, let me say that I have tried to have the debate proceed in an orderly manner.

Before I yield the floor I wish to say that the issue is very simple. In the last session, the Congress of the United States set a termination date for the OPA. All the Appropriations Committee did was within the legislative action of the previous Congress in terminating the OPA. We thought the OPA was overstaffed, we thought the OPA could drastically reduce its personnel, we thought it could pay terminal leave to its employees, gradually liquidate its activities and conduct its operations with a very greatly reduced personnel.

The Senator from Kentucky has spoken about the reference to employees falling over one another. Of course, I used that expression in a figurative manner of speaking. For example, natually I have not been sitting under a desk in the OPA, to see who falls over whom; but I know that I have seen so many people standing around doing nothing in the OPA agencies, specifically—here in the city of Washington, for example—that if they were to close their eyes they could easily fall over each other and cause a major catastrophe. So I think the point is not so far-fetched.

We are attempting to end the OPA on June 30, which is what the last Congress intended, and what it legislated should be done. The committee has recommended that the OPA be provided with sufficient money to be able to continue its functions on a very reduced scale. The OPA is now operating on a reduced scale, and there is no reason why it should not. Under the committee's recommendations, the OPA can continue rent control and sugar rationing, with a very reduced personnel, without injuring anyone in the country.

So on that statement I rest the case.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Wyoming.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Let me begin by saying that these are very sad days for the Members of the Senate on this side of the aisle. We are compelled to debate not only with Members who are speaking from the floor, but with the Chair as well. The Chair, in administering a little reproof to me a few moments ago as the beneficiary of the courtesy of the very courteous Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BRIDGES], was overlooking the fact that when I rose the Senator from Arizona was speaking. He had been speaking at length. I assumed that the Chair was administering the rules of the Senate, and that the Senator from Arizona had the floor. In any event, when I rose, I say to the Chair, I directed my request to the Senator from Arizona, to ask whether he would yield so that I might make a remark. Thereupon, the Presiding Officer turned his back upon the Senator who was making the request and turned his beaming countenance upon the Senator from New Hampshire, and asked the Senator from New Hampshire, "Does the Senator yield?"

My own impression was that the Senator from New Hampshire was kept upon his feet only by the remarks which were being made by Senators upon this side of the aisle; and that impression has just been demonstrated as being a correct one, because as soon as the rule was enforced the Senator from New Hampshire ran out of conversation and took his seat.

Mr. President, let me now inquire whether the Chair desires to enter into the debate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair has been very courteous to the Senator from Wyoming and to all other Senators on his side of the aisle, and will hope to continue to do so.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I am sure the Senator will.

Mr. President, the question now before us is a much more serious one than would be indicated by the persiflage which has been indulged in about unnamed persons falling over one another in various agencies and departments of the Government. It is very easy to say that the number of civilian employees of the Government is greater than is necessary. It is very easy to seek to carry to the public the impression that more money is being spent than should be spent, by comparing the number of persons now employed by the Federal Government with the number employed in 1939 or in some other year prior to the war.

Every Senator and every person who makes that comparison is closing his eyes to the fact that as a result of the war we have had increased Federal expenditures. We have had increased expenditures not only in the executive arm of the Government, but in the legislative arm, and this very appropriation bill now before the Senate for consideration carries with it an appropriation of $50,000 for the Joint Committee on Atomic Energy, $50,000 to enable that committee of the Congress to function between now and the 30th of June. That is an expenditure which never before was carried in any legislative bill. It is an amendment which calls for the employment of personnel.

I happened to drop in at the hearing of the subcommittee on the deficiency bill, the bill now before us, when the chairman of the Joint Committee on Atomic Energy was testifying. He laid before the committee a budget for some $250,000 for a year, a budget which provided for the employment of some 81 different employees, an increase in the personnel. The committee compromised by providing only a deficiency appropriation, and not an appropriation for the full year.

The point I make is not the size of the appropriation, not at all. The point I make is that in Congress as well as in the executive departments the laws which we pass require the employment of larger staffs.

Take the Veterans' Administration alone as an example. I had occasion just a few days ago to look at a chart printed in the United States News. It was a comparison of the number of veterans who had been awarded pensions for service-connected disabilities in World War I and in World War II within 18 months after the termination of hostilities. The figures show that 18 months after the termination of hostilities in World War I there were 25,000 veterans who had been awarded compensation for service-connected disabilities. But within 18 months after World War II 1,700,000 veterans with service-connected disabilities had been awarded their pensions, 1,700,000, and that is but the beginning of what is going to take place.

The Veterans' Administration has expanded. There are more employees now upon the rolls of the Veterans' Administration than were on the rolls of that administration prior to World War II, and considerably more than in 1939 or 1938. It is an unavoidable increase. It would be possible to go down the line and examine one bureau after another, and point out how the new demand for personnel is arising.

The Atomic Energy Commission was created by law last year. It did not exist in 1945, it did not exist in 1944. It was created last year because of the discovery of an efficient method of splitting the atom. Republicans and Democrats agree we must have the Commission, but that requires more employees.

What I suggest to our friends on the other side of the aisle is that they are talking in emotional terms about a condition which has ceased to exist. They complain about the funds which were expended to fight the depression, and the number of employees who were put upon the Federal pay roll to fight the depression. But, Mr. President, when the appropriation bills making those provisions were before the Senate and the House, there was no complaint of that kind, and when we examine the figures for those years we find that the number of employees and the number of dollars spent do not begin to compare with what had to be done as the result of the war.

Mr. President, we are dealing with the aftermath of the greatest war that was ever fought, and it remains true that here we have a bill which, if enacted in the language in which it was reported by the Committee on Appropriations, may very well put an end, in a month, to veterans' housing activities, to sugar rationing, and to rent control.

Mr. HILL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I yield.

Mr. HILL. That is exactly what General Fleming says so far as housing is concerned. He says the program for veterans' housing will be ended by March 31, that that will be the end.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. The Senator is quite right. I was about to read a letter from General Fleming.

Mr. President, we are dealing with cold facts. I say to the Senate, and particularly to those Members of the Senate who come from areas which are interested in the growing of sugar beets, that if we bring about a condition in this country which will result in a termination of sugar rationing, the demand for Cuban sugar will become so great that it will be difficult to revive the domestic beet sugar industry, after the chaos which will be produced has had its effect upon the people.

There are many Members of the Senate on both sides who have contrary views upon rent control. There are Republicans who believe that rent control should be continued, and Republicans who think it should be discontinued. There are Democrats who think it should be continued, and Democrats who think it should not be continued. It is a wholly nonpartisan issue. Yet, Mr. President, if by adopting the language of the appropriation bill we make it impossible for the agency which administers rent control to function, then we forestall the action of the legislative committees now studying that problem.

Mr. President, we are playing with fire because Senators are in such a great hurry to penalize and punish the OPA. I say to the Senate that the OPA has been progressively demobilized. I have no desire to prolong the life of OPA. Nevertheless, I am sure that no Member of Congress can read the current newspapers without knowing that prices are once more rising. Prices of food are up again. Prices of housing are up again. Prices are going up all along the line. That question will be dealt with by the appropriate committees, but here we have three items—rent control, veterans' housing, and sugar rationing—which are directly affected by this appropriation bill.

Let me read from the letter of General Fleming, addressed to the chairman of the Senate Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. HILL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I yield.

Mr. HILL. Would it disturb the Senator if I should call attention to an article which appeared just 1 week ago in the Washington Post, on the front page? The Senator referred to prices going up. The Senator may have seen the article. It was captioned, "Hog'n hominy prices set United States record; Senate unit votes 10-percent rent rise, OPA end."

Then it proceeds to tell the story:

Pork-chop price seen at $1 a pound.

Is the Senator familiar with the article?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I saw the article. I should be very glad to have the Senator read it.

Mr. HILL. Will the Senator yield to me to read the article?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. If I may do so without losing the floor.

Mr. HILL. The article is under a Chicago date line, February 25, and reads as follows:

Hog, corn, and wheat prices soared to new records today as the cost of living spiraled upward toward a predicted all-time high.

Hog prices shot up in a buying splurge on most midwestern livestock markets, hitting $30 per hundredweight in Chicago, a new top; prices of most wheat futures hit their highest levels in 30 years; corn futures reached their highest levels in 27 years. Cotton prices also were up.

In a picture of things to come, livestock men predicted housewives would be paying $1 a pound for pork chops in 2 weeks. Government sources, basing predictions on the rising livestock, grain, and cotton prices, said costs generally would hit a new high within 4 months.

Slaughter steers and heifers were up as much as 50 cents a 100 pounds as beef prices crept up slightly, but experts said plentiful beef supplies would protect housewives for a time against soaring prices for steaks and roasts.

The price advances, comparing with the old OPA ceiling of $16.25, were attributed to small receipts at the major markets.

At Washington, Labor and Agricultural Department sources agreed that the worst was yet to come, especially in food prices.

A Labor Department source predicted that the cost of living would climb to a new record peak by the end of June. The Department reported that on January 15 retail food prices were 30 percent higher than on the corresponding date a year ago.

If the Senator will yield a moment further, he will recall, no doubt, that last year when we were——

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, I rise to a point of order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator will state it.

Mr. WHERRY. I should like to state to the distinguished Senator from Wyoming, inasmuch as he made a forceful speech about violations of the rules, that birds always come home to roost. Here we have the situation reversed. I am not going to object, but I point out to the distinguished Senator that the very practice about which he complained a few moments ago is now being indulged in by a Member of the minority side.

Mr. HILL. Mr. President, if the Senator from Nebraska makes the point of order, I shall resume my seat.

Mr. WHERRY. I want the Senator to put the material in the record, because, after all, it was the President of the United States who took off price controls. So, go ahead and put it in.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Wyoming has the floor.

Mr. McFARLAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I shall yield to the Senator for a question.

Mr. McFARLAND. That is the purpose of my asking the Senator to yield. Will the Senator kindly explain what would be the effect of the language on page 6 which a Senator seeks to have stricken out?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I shall be very glad to do so.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me for a question?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I yield for a question.

Mr. HATCH. Perhaps I should address the question to the Senator from Nebraska. Did I understand correctly the Senator from Nebraska to be complaining of the action in removing controls?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Oh, no; the Senator from Nebraska was not complaining; the Senator from Nebraska was trying to have a little fun with the Senator from Wyoming. He did it sub rosa, while the Senator from Alabama was speaking, and it was quite all right.

Several Senators addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Wyoming yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I yield first to the Senator from Alabama for a question.

Mr. HILL. Mr. President, as we know, the Senator from Wyoming is a man of great ability, and, among his many other accomplishments, he is an accomplished mathematician. Could he tell us how many times the Senator from Nebraska rose on this floor demanding the abolition of price controls, particularly the abolition of price controls on beef, and cattle, and food products?

Perhaps that is an unfair question, for I am afraid, great as is the ability of the Senator from Wyoming, he would have to have an adding machine in order to be able to answer that question.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I yield to the distinguished Senator from New Mexico for a question.

Mr. HATCH. In all seriousness, I desired to propound a question because I felt there was a direct implication or charge in the statement the Senator from Nebraska just made, in which he placed responsibility on the President of the United States. I should like to inquire if the Senator means to say that the President of the United States removed price controls over the opposition of the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield at this point for a question?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I yield to the distinguished Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. BARKLEY. Regardless of who may have been responsible for the removal of price controls, can the Senator advise us as a mathematician, using all the figures at his disposal, when the Senator from Nebraska will make his final report on the meat situation?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, the exchanges which have been taking place here for the last few minutes are indicative of a situation which I should like to avoid. These exchanges have all been, I believe, in good spirit, designed to be more or less humorous, and they are I think, to some extent, prompted by partisan division. Mr. President, I want to say that partisan division upon questions of the kind we are considering is the last thing in which we should engage at this moment. If our friends upon the other side of the aisle propose to approach the legislative problems that are before this Congress as though we were still engaged in the campaign which ended upon election day, November 5, 1946, then I say to those Senators, in all sincerity and in all good faith, they will be digging a trench into which they themselves will fall. This is not a time for puny partisan divisions. This is a time for dealing with the fundamental issues of our economy and the fundamental problems of what the Government of the United States should do for the people.

My purpose in rising here this afternoon has been to call to the attention of the Senate the language of General Fleming, head of the Office of Temporary Controls, who is appealing to us, not as a partisan, but as an executive officer, upon whose shoulders has been placed the responsibility of administering the temporary controls which under the law of Congress must be carried on until Congress changes them. That is what we are dealing with.

Mr. McFARLAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I yield.

Mr. McFARLAND. Will the Senator kindly answer the question I asked?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I am just about to answer it. If the Senator will bear with me, I am laying the foundation.

Mr. WILEY. I think it is a trench.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. No; the Senators on the other side are doing very well with the trench. I am trying to fill it in at this moment.

At the very outset—

Said General Fleming—

> I should like to make clear that the principal concern of the administration is that the substantive programs—rent control, sugar rationing, housing controls—be continued effectively. The administration is less concerned what particular agency or agencies of Government be entrusted with the task of administration. In fact, I have already begun to dissolve OPA, CPA, and OWMR, the constituent agencies of OTC; and to reconstitute them into a single integrated agency.

Let me interrupt the reading of General Fleming's letter to point out that under Executive order issued by the President, the demobilization of these various agencies was undertaken—General Fleming was made the head of the Office of Temporary Controls—all for the purpose of cutting down control, for the purpose of demobilizing personnel, for the purpose of restoring the utmost amount of liberty of action in all branches of our economy, and to concentrate in one group the Office of Temporary Controls, the administration of those controls like veterans' housing, sugar rationing, and the others which, under the legislation of Congress, still had to be carried on.

> In my opinion, the use of the OTC as reconstituted would be the most economical and efficient way to handle these controls, as long as Congress decides they are necessary. Nevertheless, any decision of the Congress as to the agency or agencies of the Government which should administer the various programs now within the province of OTC will be implemented promptly.
> I wish to make it very clear that the liquidation of OPA, CPA, or OTC is not the question that concerns me. What does deeply concern me is that the Congress appropriate sufficient funds to enable the substantive programs to be continued effectively until the Congress itself decides what it wants to do with them and who shall administer them.

That is the paragraph to which I wish to call the attention of the Senate.

Responding now to the inquiry of the Senator from Arizona [Mr. McFARLAND] I shall say to him that the last proviso contained in lines 21 to 25 will have the effect of terminating these controls, not on the 30th of June 1947, but by the end of March or April. In other words the effect, as we are advised, and as I firmly believe, will be to hasten the dissolution before Congress has had an opportunity to decide what it wants to do with rent control, with sugar rationing, and with veterans' housing.

Mr. McFARLAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I yield.

Mr. McFARLAND. May I ask the Senator another question? Would that include such items as the premiums on copper, lead, and zinc which were included in the OPA Act which was passed last year?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I am inclined to believe that these premiums would be directly affected because the inevitable result of the adoption of the pending amendment will be such a reduction of personnel that OPA and CPA and the Office of Temporary Controls will be unable to function. It depends, of course, on whether these agencies administer the premiums.

Mr. McFARLAND. I should like to ask another question. Is it the opinion of the Senator from Wyoming that the language just referred to limits the expenditures to those of liquidation, or reduces the expenditures to such an extent that they would not be sufficient for the other necessary purposes?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Let me read to the Senator another paragraph or two of this letter which I think will completely answer his inquiry:

> The item in H. R. 1968 applicable to the Office of Price Administration functions is intended to cover three major activities: Rent control, sugar control, and liquidation activities. The committee report clearly indicates its recognition of the legal obligation that rests upon the Government in meeting the accrued annual leave of employees. This item, which amounts to more than $7,000,000, cannot be reduced.

That is an item which was ordered by the Congress in legislation passed by the Congress. The Appropriations Committee cannot change that policy. These accruals remain the obligation of the Government of the United States. But as General Fleming, I think, clearly demonstrates in his letter, if this bill is passed as it comes from the committee, it will result in the repudiation of that obligation. General Fleming continues:

> If I read the report correctly, the committee also recognizes the obvious necessity of using funds to carry out liquidation activities. This is a relatively inflexible sum amounting to about $5,750,000. The saving that the committee apparently contemplated in expenditures for OPA functions must lie, therefore, in reduction of expenditures for the two major operating programs; that is, rent control and sugar rationing.

I will say to the Senator now, in response to his recent inquiry, that this is a clear statement by General Fleming that the result of the adoption of the amendment will be to provide the funds to carry the terminal pay, but to deny the funds with respect to sugar rationing and rent control. General Fleming continues:

> If the liquidation and leave expenses are deducted from current unobligated balances plus the $8,000,000 deficiency appropriation item in the bill, the net amount of total available funds for the operating programs will be only $5,000,000 on March 31. However, the amount currently being expended on these same programs is $5,000,000 per month. Thus, the bill would permit operations at the present level only to April 30. To require the programs to be continued until June 30 with these funds, as the committee proposed, would call for reductions in staff so drastic as to cripple the programs.

This, I will say to the Senator from Arizona, has to do with the Office of Price Administration. There is another item in the bill which deals with the Civilian Production Administration, which, I assume, is the agency which handles the particular program in which the Senator is interested, namely, the premium on the production of copper. That item is covered in the remainder of this letter, which

I do not propose to read to the Senate at the moment.

Therefore, Mr. President, I shall close my remarks at this point with a request for unanimous consent that the entire text of the letter from General Fleming to the chairman of the Appropriations Committee of the Senate may be printed in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

OFFICE OF TEMPORARY CONTROLS.

Hon. STYLES BRIDGES,
Chairman, Committee on Appropriations, United States Senate.

DEAR SENATOR BRIDGES: I am pleased to take advantage of your invitation to convey to you my comments and suggestions regarding the Senate Appropriations Committee's action on H. R. 1968, concerning administrative expenses for functions transferred to the Office of Temporary Controls under Executive Order No. 9809.

I have read the report of your committee with care and I am most appreciative of the concern with which the committee examined the problems of the Office of Temporary Controls with regard to the functions transferred to it by Executive Order No. 9809. Nevertheless, I find that the language of the appropriation bill, as amended by the committee, and the report itself will lead to results that are contrary to the expressed desire of the committee and will make it extremely difficult to insure consistent and coherent legislative and administrative action on certain programs of major consequence. Rectification of this situation by amendment of the bill as reported out by the committee appears to me essential.

At the very outset, I should like to make clear that the principal concern of the administration is that the substantive programs—rent control, sugar rationing, housing controls—be continued effectively. The administration is less concerned what particular agency or agencies of Government be entrusted with the task of administration. In fact, I have already begun to dissolve OPA, CPA and OWMR, the constituent agencies of OTC; and to reconstitute them into a single integrated agency. In my opinion, the use of OTC as reconstituted, would be the most economical and efficient way to handle these controls as long as Congress decides they are necessary. Nevertheless, any decision of the Congress as to the agency or agencies of the Government which should administer the various programs now within the province of OTC will be implemented promptly. I wish to make it very clear that the liquidation of OPA, CPA, or OTC is not the question that concerns me. What does deeply concern me is that the Congress appropriate sufficient funds to enable the substantive programs to be continued effectively until the Congress itself decides what it wants to do with them and who shall administer them.

THE OPA APPROPRIATION ITEM

The item in H. R. 1968 applicable to the Office of Price Administration functions is intended to cover three major activities: rent control, sugar control, and liquidation activities. The committee report clearly indicates its recognition of the legal obligation that rests upon the Government in meeting the accrued annual leave of employees. This item, which amounts to more than $7,000,000, cannot be reduced.

If I read the report correctly, the committee also recognizes the obvious necessity of using funds to carry out liquidation activities. This is a relatively inflexible sum amounting to about $5,750,000. The saving that the committee apparently contemplated in expenditures for OPA functions must lie, therefore, in reduction of expenditures for the two major operating programs, i. e., rent control and sugar rationing.

If the liquidation and leave expenses are deducted from current unobligated balances plus the $8,000,000 deficiency appropriation item in the bill, the net amount of total available funds for the operating programs will be only $5,000,000 on March 31. However, the amount currently being expended on these same programs is $5,000,000 per month. Thus, the bill would permit operations at the present level only to April 30. To require the programs to be continued until June 30 with these funds, as the committee proposed, would call for reductions in staff so drastic as to cripple the programs.

Let me point out that the funds made available for OPA functions under H. R. 1968 are inadequate only because so large a proportion must be used for accrued leave and other mandatory liquidation expenses. It is the mandatory liquidation proviso that causes the difficulty. In fact, without it, the deficiency appropriation for these functions could be reduced from the present figure of approximately $8,000,000 to approximately $5,300,000.

An appropriation of this amount without the mandatory liquidation proviso would give the Congress sufficient time to determine congressional policy with regard to the continuation of these programs without running the risk of crippling them in the meantime. If the Congress decides to assign these functions to agencies other than the OTC, the funds can, of course, be transferred to such agencies at that time.

THE CPA APPROPRIATION ITEM

The report of the committee contains no discussion of the Civilian Production Administration functions. It leaves unchanged the rescission amount of $2,400,000, included in the bill as it passed the House, and merely alters the language of the discontinuance proviso so that it now reads "and its affairs shall be entirely liquidated not later than June 30, 1947."

The most important activity of CPA, the activity requiring the bulk of the personnel, is the assistance rendered the Veterans' Emergency Housing program. In the hearings before the committee it was pointed out that the OTC carries out the following functions in connection with the housing program:

1. Administering the construction limitation order which prevents the use of critical building materials in nonhousing projects that are not essential and can be deferred.

2. Increasing the production of critical building materials through channeling raw materials and equipment to the producers of these scarce items.

3. Obtaining compliance with the regulations required to carry out the housing program.

4. Auditing production records of manufacturers who have been receiving premium payments for increased production under the premium payment plan of the Housing Expediter.

It is obvious that the Veterans' Emergency Housing program cannot continue without these supporting activities.

These functions that CPA has been carrying on require a large staff for the balance of this fiscal year but a very much smaller staff thereafter. The CPA does not receive any reimbursement from the Housing Expediter for performing these functions. Consequently, the reduction in funds from the $1,200,000 rescission, which the President proposed to the Congress, to $2,400,000 voted by the House of Representatives and carried in this report, coupled with the mandatory liquidation requirement, would necessitate a cessation of this activity in support of the housing program completely on March 31 by CPA.

It must be observed that this sudden termination of OTC activities in this field with its disastrous effect on the housing program will occur in the face of continuing concurrent authority for the housing program that carries until June 30 under the Second War Powers Act and until December 31 under the Patman Act. Indeed, the report of the House Committee on Appropriations indicated that these OTC activities were to continue under present appropriations until June 30. This expressed intent cannot in fact be carried out. The funds that will remain available for CPA functions of OCT, if the bill is passed in its present form, will be so restricted that it will be necessary to send dismissal notices immediately to all CPA employees engaged in the administration of nonhousing limitation order and the other related housing activities. Accordingly, it is urgent that the mandatory liquidation proviso be removed from the bill and the rescission amount be reduced from $2,400,000 to $1,200,000.

In closing I wish to point out that regardless of the assignment of the functions for the operating program, the liquidation of many functions now vested in OTC, due to statutory requirements, cannot be completed legally, or in fact, by June 30, 1947. A few varying examples of the kinds of activities that must be carried on after June 30 are listed in appendix A. All of these functions which must continue after June 30 are presently vested in the OTC. The OTC must continue to carry them out until the Congress decides either to eliminate them or to transfer them to some other Government agency or agencies. Together these programs will save the Government many times the amount of additional funds required to continue them.

I append, for such use as you deem desirable, suggested amendments to H. R. 1968 (appendix B) that would avoid the undesirable, and, I believe, undesired results that will inevitably occur if the bill becomes law in its present form.

Sincerely yours,

PHILIP B. FLEMING,
Major General, United States Army, Administrator.

APPENDIX A

ACTIVITIES NOW VESTED IN OTC THAT MUST BE CONTINUED AFTER JUNE 30, 1947

1. On June 30 the last payments will become due under the premium price plan for copper, lead, and zinc. Claims for those payments must be processed after July 1.

2. Government claims against violators of price regulations and orders must continue to be prosecuted. These claims total $75,000,000.

3. Final audit of various subsidy operations now being carried on must be completed.

4. Cost audits under the industrial alcohol program under which OPA priced sales of industrial alcohol to the DSC must be completed.

Programs 3 and 4 also involve a saving to the Government of many millions of dollars.

5. The responsibilities imposed under section 17 of the Contract Settlement Act of 1944, the Tax Amortization Act, and the Requisitioning Acts must be carried to conclusion. The OTC in this connection is presently preparing defenses on some 117 claims against the Government which total $13,800,000.

6. On June 30 there will be thousands of cubic feet of theretofore active files to be disposed of in accordance with law and the policies of the National Archives.

7. On June 30 there will be permanent status employees—now in OTC—who, under existing regulations, must be carried on the pay roll until the expiration of their annual leave and whose leave cannot be paid in a lump sum. There will be many employees in this category on June 30.

APPENDIX B

SUGGESTED AMENDMENTS TO H. R. 1968 AS REPORTED OUT BY SENATE APPROPRIATIONS COMMITTEE

1. Page 6, lines 11, 21–25: Substitute "$5,290,000" for "$7,991,815." Strike the following proviso: "Provided, That it is the intent of the Congress that all funds heretofore and herein appropriated shall be used to defray all expenses incident to the closing and liquidation of the Office of Price Administration and the Office of Temporary Controls by June 30, 1947."

2. Page 9, lines 7–10: Substitute "$1,200,000" for "$2,400,000" and strike the following proviso: "Provided, That the Civilian Production Administration shall be discontinued and its affairs shall be entirely liquidated not later than June 30, 1947."

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, in connection with the subject now under discussion, I ask to have printed in the RECORD an editorial appearing in today's issue of the Washington Evening Star entitled "Significant Warning." The editorial comments on the position taken by the National Federation of Federal Employees on the issue of reduction in Federal personnel. The editorial says in substance that it is unusual for a union of Federal employees to comment on the reduction of Federal personnel.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SIGNIFICANT WARNING

The position taken by the National Federation of Federal Employees on the issue of a reduction in Federal personnel is so unusual as to be worthy of special attention.

The NFFE is the oldest, wealthiest, and probably the largest union of Federal workers. Ordinarily one would expect a union of that status to be in the ranks of those resisting the efforts of the new Congress to bring about a contraction of the Federal Government's working force. Far from joining this opposition movement, however, the NFFE, in the March issue of its official publication, sharply rebukes those officials of the executive department who are resisting the drive to reduce pay rolls and eliminate employees of "dubious loyalty."

At first glance this might seem to be strange procedure for a union presumably interested in keeping as many of its members as possible on the public pay roll. Actually, however, it is a move that is indicative of a degree of intelligence all too often lacking in union tactics.

For the fact of the matter is that the Republican Congress is going to insist on a substantial reduction in force in the executive branch. If there are administrators who believe, as the NFFE charges, that their agencies cannot be curtailed "in the slightest degree," and who hope to be able to "outsmart" the congressional Appropriations Committees, they have a rude awakening in store. For the cut-backs are coming.

The only real question is whether this will be done as painlessly as possible, with the intelligent cooperation of executive officials, or whether, in the words of the NFFE statement, an exasperated Congress will resort to "meat ax" tactics. If the latter proves to be the case, then the best interests of all Federal workers will suffer most.

Mr. AIKEN. Mr. President, I desire to speak briefly in regard to the subject now before the Senate.

It appears that the time has come when the Congress must decide which of the wartime controls it wishes to continue, and how it wishes to continue those which should be continued. I wish to present a few facts and observations concerning the OPA.

It appears that the OPA now has three functions, namely, rent control for residences only, sugar control, and rice control. To exercise these three functions the agency had at the beginning of this year a total of 15,574 employees. That number may be somewhat reduced by this time, but that was the number on December 31, 1946. Of this number 6,654 wer engaged in rent control. The agency had 8 regional offices and 329 area rent offices, besides 315 branch rent offices.

So far as the controls over rice and sugar are concerned, it is my understanding that the OPA already depends upon the Department of Agriculture for its estimate of the supply, and usually follows the suggestions of the Department of Agriculture as to rationing rice and sugar. It is perfectly clear that if the OPA were abolished by one method or another rice and sugar rationing and controls could readily be transferred to the Department of Agriculture. That leaves us with consideration of rent control, which is the largest single activity in the OPA, and utilizes almost half of its personnel.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. AIKEN. I yield.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. In making the statement that sugar control could be transferred to the Department of Agriculture, has the Senator taken into consideration the fact that in this amendment, the elimination of which is requested, we find the word "heretofore," which refers to any appropriation that may heretofore have been made? The Chair has ruled that that language has no legal binding effect; but if it is retained in the bill it will certainly have a moral effect. Does not the Senator believe that if we desire to maintain sugar rationing we should not tamper with a dangerous amendment of this character?

Mr. AIKEN. I shall come to that point a little later. As I understand the ruling of the Chair, it was—perhaps not in so many words—to the effect that this amendment would have no force of law in requiring the OPA to use all its funds for liquidating purposes. As I stated, the OPA has a total of 652 offices devoted to rent control. The biggest problem involved is the quick hearing of complaints and appeals by landlords and tenants at hundreds of widely scattered points.

It would appear—and I say this after receiving information which I consider to be authentic and accurate—that the rent-control activities could well be transferred to the Department of Commerce, and that funds for this purpose could also be transferred to the Department of Commerce. If that were done, it is my understanding that the Department of Commerce could carry on the functions of rent control with approximately 3,000 more employees than it now has. In other words, we would have to transfer about 3,000 employees from the present rolls of the OPA to the Department of Commerce, if that permanent agency of government were to take over rent-control activities. The Department of Commerce already has 77 regularly established offices, with 852 employees. Those 77 offices could be used as a nucleus for what is needed for rent-control activities.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. AIKEN. I yield.

Mr. LUCAS. Is the Senator now telling the Senate that there is legislation pending whereby the rent-control agency will be transferred to the Department of Commerce?

Mr. AIKEN. Unfortunately, there is not. I shall reach that point in a few minutes, and then I shall be through.

Mr. LUCAS. It seems to me that until such legislation is pending we cannot anticipate that that will be done, so far as what we are attempting to do through this appropriation bill is concerned.

Mr. AIKEN. I was simply stating what would be necessary in the way of personnel if the activities were transferred to the Department of Commerce. The best information which I have—and this information is received through the staff of the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments, which has been making a study of the functions and activities of a good many departments of government—is to the effect that 3,000 employees transferred to the Department of Commerce, with the organization which the Department of Commerce already maintains, could exercise as much control over residential rents as does the existing organization of the OPA.

What I wish to say is that if we are to transfer to permanent agencies of Government the functions of the OPA in regard to sugar and rice rationing and rent control, it should be done by the Congress in an orderly manner. We should not do it by going in the back door and making it impossible for the OPA to perform the functions which it is required by law to perform. For that reason I should have voted to strike out the proviso in the bill that the funds appropriated shall be used for liquidating the OPA. Very obviously that would make it impossible for the OPA to perform its duties as required by law. So it seems to me that we should continue OPA for the time being. I hope that it will use this appropriation in performing its duties as it is supposed to perform them, so long as the money lasts.

I have heard the date April 30 mentioned. It seems to me that by April 30 the Congress could make arrangements for transferring the functions of rent control, sugar control, and rice control to permanent agencies of the Government if it is determined that such controls are to be continued. If that were done, there would be a saving by reason of a reduction in the number of Government employees from 15,574, which were employed by OPA on January 1, to probably a third of that number. Probably a third of that number could carry on the duties which now rest on the OPA, if the actiivties were incorporated with existing agencies of Government. We must do that sometime. It may be that this spring is the time when such duties should be transferred.

We have also obtained data in regard to the CPA and the Office of Temporary Controls. I think there are approximately 6,000 employees in those two agencies. I do not agree with those who say that the three agencies should be combined into one and continued. It seems to me that it would be best to transfer to regular departments of the Government such functions as the Congress determines should be continued. In the case of the OPA, that would mean the Department of Agriculture and the Department of Commerce. I believe that a real saving in personnel and funds could be made by so doing. Although I shall vote for the appropriation as set forth in the deficiency appropriation bill, I shall not do it with the expectation, or even the hope, that the OPA will use the money for the purpose of liquidating, but will use it for the purpose of performing its duties as required by law so long as the money lasts.

Mr. HAYDEN. I take it from the Senator's last remark that he agrees with me that this proviso should be stricken from the bill. I can understand perfectly that if we were to adopt the amendment omitting the proviso, it would be possible, with the arrangement we have set up, to carry on until a legislative committee of the Senate could determine what to do. But if that proviso were to be retained, directing that OPA must liquidate and do nothing else, it would be liquidated before it would be possible for the Congress to enact legislation saying what shall be done with rent control and what is to be done otherwise.

Mr. AIKEN. The proviso does not have the effect of law.

Mr. HAYDEN. If the Senator were an administrative officer, and the act stated that it was the intent of the Congress that certain things should be done, would he not do them? Would he ignore the law?

Mr. AIKEN. I assure the Senator from Arizona that if I am required to vote for this proviso in order that the bill may pass, it is not my intention that the money shall be used for liquidating purposes, but for the purpose of performing the duties of the OPA so long as the money lasts.

Mr. HAYDEN. It is utterly impossible to do so.

Mr. AIKEN. In the meantime I think we should provide for transferring to other agencies of the Government such functions as are continued.

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. AIKEN. I yield.

Mr. LANGER. Will the Senator tell me how many employees the OPA had when it was in full bloom?

Mr. AIKEN. My recollection is that the number was 45,000 or 50,000.

Mr. LANGER. And there are 15,000 now?

Mr. AIKEN. There were 15,574 on the 31st of December 1946.

Mr. LANGER. How many do they have now?

Mr. AIKEN. I do not know. I think there has been a slight reduction.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me so that I may give the figures?

Mr. AIKEN. I yield.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. In December 1945 OPA had 37,464 employees; in July 1946 they had 33,330; in November 1946 they had 32,368; on December 15, 1946, 15,574, and in January 1947, 14,006.

Mr. AIKEN. There has been a slight reduction. Of the 15,000 or more, approximately 6,600 were engaged in rent control. From the studies which the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments has made through its staff, the conclusion has been reached that if 3,000 of those employees were transferred to the Department of Commerce, using the facilities of that Department they could perform the same functions as the 6,600 are now performing.

Mr. LANGER. That would get rid of 3,000?

Mr. AIKEN. That is correct. We would also get rid of the over-all organization.

I want to give the OPA credit for doing much good work during the war in spite of the numberless aggravating mistakes they made; but I think the time has come—it had to come sometime—when temporary Government agencies must be dispensed with and the remaining functions transferred to regular establishments of the Government.

Mr. LANGER. When does the Senator think that time should arrive?

Mr. AIKEN. I think it is here, so far as the OPA is concerned.

Mr. LANGER. What is the objection to the proviso which the Senator from Arizona [Mr. HAYDEN] just mentioned?

Mr. AIKEN. I do not like it. I do not believe in eliminating the effectiveness of OPA by inserting a proviso which makes it impossible to function properly during the time it has left.

Mr. LANGER. How would it prevent them from functioning properly?

Mr. AIKEN. If they had to use the money appropriated for liquidation purposes, or paying terminal leave, or whatever it is called in the OPA, they would not be able to use the same amount of money in the performance of other duties. I agree with the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BRIDGES] that they could do their work for less money than they are doing it for now, but I think that some other agency of Government, particularly the Department of Commerce, could do it for probably a fourth as much as the work is now costing.

Mr. BRIDGES. Mr. President, if I may answer the distinguished Senator from North Dakota——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Vermont yield?

Mr. AIKEN. I yield for that purpose.

Mr. BRIDGES. The bill as reported by the committee proposes to give OPA approximately $7,000,000 to pay all terminal leave obligations and approximately $6,000,000 for liquidation expenses, or a total of approximately $13,000,000. The bill also provides more than $4,000,000 for administrative expense. A part of the cost of liquidation may be involved in that sum. The total sum makes possible a continuation of operations until June 30, but on a very reduced scale as to personnel. In the meantime, we are in the process of liquidating the agency and paying the obligations involved.

The Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY] objected to my using the figure of speech about employees "falling over each other." They will have plenty of room to move about in the various offices with the force we are giving them, but in my judgment there will still be a sufficient number of employees to perform the duties required by law, which, as the Senator from Vermont has said, will involve simply rent control on residences, sugar rationing, and rice rationing, until Congress can determine what it wants done with those subjects in the coming year.

Mr. AIKEN. The point I was raising was that in all probability the OPA, operating as a separate entity, cannot perform the functions on so greatly reduced a scale, but if the functions of rent control were transferred to the Department of Commerce, and sugar and rice control were transferred to the Department of Agriculture, it would be possible to continue such controls at approximately 25 percent of the cost which would be entailed if OPA were retained as a separate agency.

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for another question?

Mr. AIKEN. I yield.

Mr. LANGER. Does that statement mean that the personnel will be reduced 75 percent?

Mr. AIKEN. Yes, if the functions are transferred to other departments of government; but not if the OPA is retained as a separate agency.

Mr. BRIDGES. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. AIKEN. I yield.

Mr. BRIDGES. Under the committee's provision, even as a separate agency, OPA would be reduced by 75 percent. The only question between the Senator from Vermont and myself is that he prefers to have the functions, when the reduction is made, placed in the hands of some other agency rather than in the hands of the OPA until it is transferred.

Mr. AIKEN. I maintain that in all probability the OPA cannot perform its duties with a 75-percent reduction, but that if its duties were transferred to regular departments of the Government they could be administered.

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. AIKEN. I yield.

Mr. HAYDEN. Is there any legislation or any prospect of legislation providing for what the Senator is suggesting? As matters now stand, certain bills provide for the control of sugar rationing and the rationing of other commodities?

Mr. AIKEN. Yes.

Mr. HAYDEN. But no action has been taken. The Senate has nothing before it to indicate what will be the recommendations of the committees. In the meantime, the Committee on Appropriations reports a bill with a proviso tying up the money for the OPA in terminal leave and liquidation activities, so reducing the sum that the OPA cannot function, according to the testimony before the committee, beyond the 30th day of next month or about 6 weeks from now. If Congress does not do something by that time there will be no rent control and there will be no sugar rationing. It will all be over, because there will be no money to pay the personnel to carry on.

Mr. AIKEN. I agree with the Senator from Arizona.

Mr. HAYDEN. If that be the case, I do not see why we should tie the subject up in that kind of a package, with the proviso that the OPA must use the money for liquidation and not for operation. Without this directive it would be possible to carry on until Congress can enact appropriate legislation providing that rent control shall be transferred to a certain agency and that sugar rationing shall be transferred to another agency, and directing that the remaining appropriations and personnel be transferred to such agencies so as to enable them to do that work.

We are now acting absolutely in the dark; and any Senator who votes for the proviso, votes to kill rent control on the 30th of April, because under the proviso there is no way that the intention of Congress can be carried out except by killing rent control and killing sugar rationing on that date. Let us be frank about it.

Mr. TAFT. Mr. President, will the Senator from Vermont yield?

Mr. AIKEN. I yield.

Mr. TAFT. Sugar rationing will be through by March 31, and we shall have a sugar rationing bill by that time. There is no reason why we should not have a rent control bill by the 30th of April. The adoption of the proviso is the way to stop the operations of this agency. If the proviso is deleted, the agency will be back for more money.

Mr. HAYDEN. Oh, no.

Mr. TAFT. It absolutely will be back for more money. If we delete this proviso, the agency will be able to come back to Congress for more money, and will do so, of course.

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. President, the Senator from Ohio is entirely mistaken about that.

Mr. AIKEN. Mr. President, I agree with the Senator from Ohio that the Congress should act without delay upon rent control and sugar rationing. I do not think we can act too soon upon those two important matters; and when we act upon them, I think we should transfer enforcement of those controls to other agencies of the Government. In the meantime, I think the OPA should have adequate funds with which to perform the duties required of it under the law.

Mr. HAYDEN. I am in entire accord with the views expressed by the Senator.

Mr. AIKEN. I do not like this amendment.

Mr. HAYDEN. I am in entire accord with the Senator's views.

Mr. President, when the Congress passes a bill relating to rent control, regardless of where the appropriation for it may be made, Congress can provide in the bill that the money shall go along with the functions. We shall not lose anything if we proceed in that way. But if by this proviso the Congress directs that the money can be spent only for terminal leave and liquidation expenses, and if no provision is made for sufficient money to enable the agency to carry on its legitimate functions, it must quit. That is all it can do if it obeys the intent of Congress.

Mr. BRIDGES obtained the floor.

Mr. CORDON. Mr. President——

Mr. BRIDGES. I yield to the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. CORDON. I should like to inquire of the Senator from New Hampshire whether there is an error in the present wording of the proviso at the bottom of page 6 of the committee amendment. To explain my point, let me say it was my understanding at the committee meeting that the purpose of the proviso was to make available for liquidation expenses and terminal-leave costs all funds made available or remaining available or herein made available to the OPA.

The wording is:

Provided, That it is the intent of the Congress that all funds heretofore and herein appropriated shall be used to defray all expenses incident to the closing and liquidation of the Office of Price Administration and the Office of Temporary Controls by June 30, 1947.

Is it not the Senator's view, as it is mine, that the proper language should be:

That it is the intent of the Congress that the funds heretofore and herein appropriated shall include all expenses incident to the closing and liquidation of the Office of Price Administration and the Office of Temporary Controls by June 30, 1947.

Mr. BRIDGES. That is correct, and that is the way the language should read.

Mr. CORDON. At the appropriate time, I should like to offer an amendment to that effect.

Mr. BRIDGES. After the amendment of the Senator from Idaho is voted upon I think such an amendment would be in order. So far as I am concerned, I shall be delighted to accept it, because I think it clarifies the meaning.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. In the opinion of the Chair, the language of the proviso should be perfected before the amendment of the Senator from Idaho to strike out the proviso is submitted to the Senate.

Mr. BRIDGES. Very well.

Mr. CORDON. Then, Mr. President, I offer the following amendment: In the committee amendment, on page 6, in line 22, strike out the word "all" and insert in lieu thereof the word "the"; and at the end of that line strike out the word "be." In line 23, on that page, strike out the words "used to defray", and insert in lieu thereof the word "include."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The proviso as it would read with the amendment just offered will be stated.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

Provided, That it is the intent of the Congress that the funds heretofore and herein appropriated shall include all expenses incident to the closing and liquidation of the Office of Price Administration and the Office of Temporary Controls by June 30, 1947.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Oregon to the committee amendment on page 6.

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Arizona is recognized.

Mr. HAYDEN. I wish to make inquiry as to the effect of the amendment to the committee amendment. As I read it now it is, again, an expression of a pious wish which carries no legal obligation at all. According to my view of the amendment, it would provide that the Office of Price Administration and the Office of Temporary Controls may use the funds herein appropriated, in part, or to such an extent as they may determine, to cover expenses incident to the closing and liquidation of the respective agencies, but they are not required to do so.

Mr. CORDON. Mr. President, the legal effect of the proviso has at least been stated by the chairman of the committee to be in accord with his view. My view of it is that it will at least be strongly binding upon the OPA, requiring it to follow the expressed wish of the Congress. As I view the amendment, if it be the expression of a pious wish, at least it is a pious wish exactly and correctly expressed; and as I recall the figures which were before the committee, if the agency follows that pious wish the result will be substantially as follows: The agency now has $15,000,000 of unused funds from existing appropriations. It estimates that it will need, in round figures, $12,700,000 to pay terminal leave and liquidation charges. That would leave $2,000,000 available for current and future expenses, to which there is added, in round numbers, $8,000,000, making a total of $10,000,000, exclusive of liquidation costs and terminal-leave costs, with which the OPA can continue in operation until the 30th day of June—or $2,000,000 a month. The OPA claims it is now spending, in round numbers, $5,100,000 a month.

Mr. HAYDEN. That is correct.

Mr. CORDON. However, it is also claimed that it will cost $5,700,000 for the OPA to quit. I do not mean that it will cost the OPA that much to pay wages or to pay accumulated leave; but I mean after the OPA has paid them, it will cost that much money, according to the claim, for the OPA to fold up and quit. I cannot understand how, based on any standard of economy, it can cost $5,700,000 for that agency to quit work. I believe it can quit with the expenditure of far less money, and I believe that whatever money is saved in connection with that operation will then be available to the OPA to be added to the $2,000,000 a month, thus maintaining a reasonable operation not only to the end of April, but into May, and, if necessary, to the end of June.

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. President, I am no better qualified than is the Senator from Oregon to express an opinion as to what the cost of liquidation will be, but I know that personnel are required to cancel leases for offices, to gather up equipment and sell it, to gather up papers and file them in the Archives, and to do all the other things that it is necessary to do, including making up pay rolls, and so forth. The estimate is $5,000,000. The effect of the amendment, if its provisions should be carried out in good faith, would be to cut down by three-fifths the operation of rent control and of sugar rationing, for, according to the Senator's figure, the force now used in carrying forward the activities of the OPA in connection with rent control and sugar rationing and its other activities would be cut by three-fifths.

Mr. CORDON. If I may answer the question, if we prorate the available funds over 4 months, that is correct. There is no requirement, however, that they be prorated on an average basis. There may be $4,000,000 used in March, $3,000,000 in April, $2,000,000 in May, and one million in June, and there would still be used the same amount of money. There is ample latitude for the Administrator to continue the job which he is now doing, that of reducing the field force and the office force. He says he can reduce it, and as he does reduce it, he needs less money.

Mr. HAYDEN. It is not possible to liquidate the Boston office and at the same time operate it. Those two things simply cannot be done at the same time. As I pointed out awhile ago, either the office has to be continued to carry on rent control in the city of Boston until the 30th of June, or it will be necessary to liquidate the office, whether it is done in April or May or some other time. It has to be done with all other offices in the United States in the same way.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment submittted by the Senator from Oregon [Mr. CORDON] to the committee amendment.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, I have attempted to analyze the amendment which has been reported by the Committee on Appropriations, in the hope that I could go along with the committee; but it seems to me that what we are asked to do would cripple the services of the OPA insofar as any real enforcement of rent control or sugar rationing is concerned. That is especially true if the funds which they have will not enable them to carry on in an efficient way beyond April 30, as is set forth in the letter from General Fleming to the distinguished Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BRIDGES].

I undertake to say that there is not any evidence before the committee or the Senate on which anyone can make a fair guess as to the number of employees it will take to carry on in an efficient manner the functions of rent control. I am inclined to believe that the agency should be supplied with sufficient personnel to enable it to carry on its work until at least the 30th of June, the date of the termination of the Office of Price Administration.

Why all this rush, Mr. President? Only 2 months or so remain before the OPA will expire, or before whatever is left of it will be transferred to some other Government agency. It is rather strange to see intelligent men rushing forward to cut these appropriations, as is being done now, in order to kill off completely the OPA.

Today there are being considered before the Committee on Banking and Currency bills to increase the amount of rent which may be charged by landlords. I think there is merit in some of the bills which are now before the committee, but I do not think there is anyone who wants to kill rent control completely, and that is exactly what is being done in the pending appropriation bill. When the efficient enforcement of rent control is destroyed as of April 30 and there is no personnel whatever of any kind to carry on enforcement activities of that agency, we might as well say that rent control in this country is at an end.

There will remain on the statute books a law penalizing severely landlords who violate it, yet there will be no one in Boston, Chicago, Detroit, or St. Louis, or any other regional office with the personnel to do anything whatever about the enforcement of that law from April 30 to June 30. It is preposterous to have a law with criminal penalties without any machinery for enforcement. That is the truth of the matter, and there is no way of escaping it. This is the beginning, by a back door method, of destroying rent control. If that is the purpose it should not be effectuated by indirect methods.

Those who favor such a course should come forward with a bill, let the Senate debate it pro and con, and decide whether it wants to continue sugar control, whether it wants to continue rent control, or any other control that is in existence at the present time.

Such proposals are frequently made by the Committee on Appropriations of the Senate. Instead of letting the proper legislative committee propose a bill, they take it upon themselves to put some agency out of existence by denying it the proper appropriation.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Illinois yield?

Mr. LUCAS. I yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. MYERS. Then, am I to understand the Senator from Illinois to mean that it is his interpretation that a vote against the Taylor amendment is a vote against effective rent control as of April 1, 1947?

Mr. LUCAS. That is my own opinion about it.

Mr. MYERS. I am perfectly in accord with the Senator's opinion. That is my own opinion.

Mr. LUCAS. That is my opinion about the matter. I must reach that conclusion after I carefully analyze the letter which has been written by General Fleming, who is now in charge of the agency affected.

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. President, will the Senator from Illinois yield?

Mr. LUCAS. I yield to the Senator from Arizona.

Mr. HAYDEN. I wish to invite the attention of the Senator and of the Senate to the fact that if we adopt the pending amendment General Fleming, as the responsible executive officer, will construe it to mean that he must close down rent control and close down sugar rationing on the 30th day of April, as the only way in which he can carry out the directive. If we understand that and know what we are doing, it is all right with me.

Mr. LUCAS. I will say, with all due deference to the ruling of the Chair—and I think he is correct in it—in view of the fact that OPA has taken a continuous pounding by the Senate of the United States for failure to carry out the intent of the Congress, if I were in Philip Fleming's place I would follow out the letter of the proviso.

Mr. HILL. Mr. President, is it not true that the Senate Committee on Banking and Currency is the committee which has jurisdiction over the matter of controls, rent control and the other controls?

Mr. LUCAS. The Senator is correct.

Mr. HILL. And that that committee, or a subcommittee has been studying the matter ever since the present Congress met, and from what we see in the newspapers, is not that committee about ready to render its decision as to what it thinks should be done?

Mr. LUCAS. That is correct.

Mr. HILL. Yet, without waiting for the decision of the proper committee, the committee which has studied the matter, the committee whose business it is to suggest legislation on the subject, we are asked this afternoon, in considering the pending appropriation bill, to stamp out rent and other controls.

Mr. LUCAS. The Senator is absolutely correct on that score, and that is what I said a moment ago with respect to rent control. That is one of the last controls that is left in the United States. If we had plenty of sugar at the present time there would be no rationing of sugar; but, so far as I know, no one wants the complete abandonment of control over rents. There are many bills before the Committee on Banking and Currency with respect to an increase in rent charges, many of which in my opinion have merit. But speaking directly to my able friend from New Hampshire, for whom I have great affection, I say that just so surely as this amendment shall be agreed to, we will find on April 30 that there will be no rent control whatever in this country. One office after another will be completely closed, or at least will have working only a skeleton force which will not be worth talking about so far as any real enforcement is concerned. Just so surely as rent control is broken down during May and June, then when an attempt is made to restablish it, the situation will be reminiscent of what happened last year. Senators recall, no doubt, what happened last year in the case of OPA after we took off the controls and then attempted to reestablish them. It just did not work, and this will not work either.

I hope that the Senator from New Hampshire will withdraw the committee amendment, because of the ruling of the Chair, who emphatically states that this proviso means nothing, and yet I am certain the agencies responsible for its administration are bound to construe it in the manner stated by the Senator from Arizona.

Mr. BRIDGES. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LUCAS. I yield.

Mr. BRIDGES. Has the Senator concluded?

Mr. LUCAS. I have not concluded; but I shall be glad to yield.

Mr. BRIDGES. I merely desire to keep the record straight. I do not desire to ask the Senator a question, but I should like to straighten out the record a little, if I may.

Mr. LUCAS. I would be pleased to have the record straightened out.

Mr. BRIDGES. The Senate Committee on Appropriations did not voluntarily come in with this provision. How did it originate? The OPA themselves came before the Congress and in effect said, "We have violated the law; we have violated title 31 of section 665 of the United States Code." That being so, the officials are subject to the penalty of imprisonment, and drastic action may be taken. Let me say to the Senator, the departments of the Government for 15 years have been operating on a deficit basis. They do not know how to live within their appropriations, and many of them frankly do not intend to do so.

This issue was not raised by the Senate or by the Senate Committee on Appropriations; it was raised by the OPA. Why? Because they had violated the laws of the land by spending more money than the law authorized; after which they came forward with requests for deficiency appropriations.

The Senator has stated that a vote for this measure is the beginning of the end of rent control. I say that that is incorrect. A vote for it is a beginning of the end of OPA; I admit that; but not of rent control. Of course, they can carry on. Let us be fair. Let us take the Washington office. Turning to the House hearings, at page 80, whom do we find they have employed in the Washington office?

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, do I have the floor?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Illinois had the floor. He has yielded. He may reclaim the floor if he wishes to do so.

Mr. LUCAS. I merely wondered if I had the floor.

Mr. BRIDGES. I told the Senator I was not asking a question; but I should like the courtesy of being permitted to explain the position.

Mr. LUCAS. That is perfectly all right. Go right ahead.

Mr. BRIDGES. In the Washington office there are 914 employees receiving in excess of $4,000 a year. There are but 851 employees of less than executive status. In other words, there are more executives than there are ordinary employees in the Washington office. That is a deplorable condition—there are more generals than privates.

Let us look at some of them. On page 80 of the House hearings there are listed 122 economists. We are told that the only thing that is being done is the work of rent control; the only things they are doing are rice rationing and sugar rationing. Why do they need 122 economists, if all that is being done is to regulate those three things?

Looking further down the list, we find graphic analysts, executive officers, training specialists—employees are still being trained—commodity standards specialists; historians. There is almost an entire group of historians working in the Washington office at the present time. There are employees of all kinds—personnel officers, archivists—I do not know what they are, but there are quite a number of them on the pay roll, all in big executive jobs, all receiving more than $4,000 a year. In the Washington office I repeat, there are more executives than there are ordinary personnel. That holds true throughout OPA.

Let no one tell me that it is impossible to cut down the personnel of OPA and still have it operate in an efficient manner, performing the job that has been given it to do, which is to perform only those three functions until June 30.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, I shall not detain the Senate much longer. If it is desired to cut off OPA at the roots, at this particular time, I can stand it. I shall be able to get along. But I believe that the country would be better satisfied if we liquidated OPA in an orderly and systematic fashion. That is all I am advocating.

I make the prophecy that if this amendment is adopted, OPA will for all intents and purposes be completely out of business on April 30. We will experience a total break-down in the rent controls throughout the country.

Mr. President, I respectfully submit that this is not the way to eliminate rent and sugar controls. Once the enforcement agency is put out of business, it will never again function. I suspect that is exactly what is wanted by some Senators, but that is not the way that I would do it. That is especially true, in view of what the Committee on Banking and Currency is doing now with respect to the bills which have been introduced, seeking to raise rents by a percentage, but not abolishing rent control altogether.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment submitted by the Senator from Oregon [Mr. CORDON].

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question now recurs on the motion of the Senator from Idaho [Mr. TAYLOR], to strike out the proviso at the bottom of page 6, as amended.

Mr. HAYDEN. Let us have the yeas and nays.

Mr. BRIDGES. Mr. President, I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The clerk will call the roll.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Eighty-seven Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present.

The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Idaho [Mr. TAYLOR] to strike out the proviso at the bottom of page 6, as amended. On this question the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. President, I should like to state for the information of Senators who have just come into the Senate Chamber the effect of the adoption of the proviso. According to the testimony before our committee and according to the letter written by General Fleming, he will carry out the intent of Congress, but in order to do so he will pay out some $7,000,000 in terminal leave and liquidation will cost about $5,000,000, which means that sugar rationing and rent control will come to an end on the 30th day of April. If Senators want to cut off sugar rationing and rent control on the 30th of April, they should vote "nay" on the pending question. If Senators want to have sugar rationing and rent control carried on in a reasonable way until Congress can act, then they should vote to strike out the proviso.

Mr. TAFT. Mr. President, I merely wish to point out that so far as sugar rationing is concerned, it ends on the 31st of March, anyway, and we have to pass a sugar bill before the 31st of March if we wish to have the sugar rationing continued, because the Second War Powers Act has expired.

So far as rent control is concerned, there is no reason whatever why we should not decide what our policy with respect to rent control shall be before the 30th of April.

Mr. HAYDEN. The Senator from Ohio does not disagree with me, however, that the administrative authority, for whom we are making this appropriation, serves notice on the Congress now that in good conscience we should know what he intends to do in the carrying out of this proviso, which is to bring these two controls to an end on the 30th of April.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, during the years I was a member of the Appropriations Committee, I often heard some of the executives of Government agencies state that they could not do this or could not do that unless they were granted a certain amount of money. I am sure they were often very sincere in such statements. Yet it is remarkable what can be done when the old American spirit of improvisation is invoked. So I do not think we can accept didactic statements on either side of this question exactly as they are written.

I was a little late in coming into the Senate Chamber because I had some other business to attend to. I should like to ask the Senator from New Hampshire one or two questions to clarify the subject in my mind. As I understand, $9,000,000 was asked for, but was not allowed by the House. Is that correct?

Mr. BRIDGES. No. When OPA came before the House they said they had approximately $9,000,000, and then they asked for a sum of $5,290,000 in a new appropriation. What the House did was to deny them the appropriation and make a rescission, that is, the House provided that they should pay back into the Treasury $9,000,000, which in effect would have closed their doors on February 28.

Mr. LODGE. The point on which I am trying to get enlightenment is this: On page 2 of the report the statement is made, and I do not see that it is challenged anywhere, that an appropriation of approximately $8,000,000 is to be made to permit the OPA to carry on until June 30, 1947, and to provide for the liquidation activities and the payment of all terminal leaves. That indicates to me that the activities could be continued until June 30, 1947. Is that correct?

Mr. BRIDGES. That is correct.

Mr. LODGE. Then it is evident that the contention that OPA could continue only until April 30, 1947, is simply a mere matter of opinion?

Mr. BRIDGES. That is correct.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. TAYLOR] to strike out the proviso as amended.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. A parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator will state it.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Is it not a fact that the lines proposed to be eliminated are now in the bill? Therefore the question is whether those lines shall remain in the bill. Senators who favor the retention of the lines, which mean the proviso, should vote "yea," and those opposed to the retention of the lines should vote "nay"?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That is not the Chair's understanding of the situation. The Senator from Idaho has offered an amendment striking out the proviso. Therefore the question is submitted in this form. Those who wish to strike out the proviso will vote "yea". Those who wish to retain the proviso will vote "nay."

The clerk will call the roll.

Mr. TAYLOR. Mr. President——

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll, and Mr. AIKEN voted "yea" when his name was called.

Mr. TAYLOR. Mr. President, in view of the Chair's ruling that the proviso as it now stands merely expresses a pious wish, it seems to me to be passing strange that the Congress should undertake to enact legislation that really has no meaning and will be confusing to everyone, including the agency at which it is aimed. If we are going to indulge in that kind of practice perhaps we had better install on the floor of the Senate in front of the desk, a wishing well, where we can throw such legislation.

Mr. BREWSTER. Mr. President, a point of order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator will state it.

Mr. BREWSTER. I understood the call of the roll had been begun, and that the Senator from Vermont [Mr. AIKEN] had voted "yea" when his name was called.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Idaho addressed the Chair before the vote started. In the opinion of the Chair the Senator from Idaho is entitled to proceed.

Mr. TAYLOR. Mr. President, I mean to say that if——

Mr. AIKEN. Mr. President, a point of order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator will state it.

Mr. AIKEN. Does my vote stand?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator's vote does not stand. If the Senator responded, the vote does not stand. The roll call will start from the beginning when it is called.

Mr. AIKEN. I thank the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Idaho may proceed.

Mr. TAYLOR. Mr. President, I am a member of the Committee on Banking and Currency. As has been previously pointed out, we have been considering the subject of rent control for a number of weeks and have done much work on it. If now we are to kill rent control by indirection, it will make all the work which we have been doing in the committee a complete loss, and will make a farce of the whole operation.

As I understand, the Reorganization Act is specifically against the idea of legislating on appropriation bills. It was most gratifying to me a moment ago to hear the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. WHERRY] try to get out from under the responsibility for killing OPA last summer by stating that the President killed OPA.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. TAYLOR. I am happy to yield.

Mr. WHERRY. I asked the question, if it was not true that the President killed OPA. I am not trying to get out from under anything.

Mr. TAYLOR. I did not so understand the Senator.

Mr. WHERRY. I asked the question, Did not the President kill OPA? Let the Senator answer the question.

Mr. TAYLOR. I did not so understand the Senator.

Mr. TOBEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. TAYLOR. I yield.

Mr. TOBEY. Who killed Cock Robin?

Mr. TAYLOR. Mr. President, this is the first time I ever heard the Senator from Nebraska when he was willing to share honors with the President of the United States on the question of who killed OPA. I distinctly remember the Senator from Nebraska and the distinguished Senator from Ohio [Mr. TAFT] almost coming to blows on the other side of the aisle over who should have the greatest honor in killing OPA.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. TAYLOR. I yield.

Mr. WHERRY. The Senator from Texas [Mr. O'DANIEL] wanted the honor.

Mr. TAYLOR. He wanted to participate, but he did not take part in the argument between the Senator from Nebraska and the Senator from Ohio. That was one of the most heated arguments I have ever heard on the floor of the Senate. The argument was over the question who had been most influential in scuttling OPA. Both Senators wanted the honor. The time seems to have come when they are not so anxious to have the honor, and they are willing to take President Truman in and share the honor with him. The chickens are coming home to roost. Prices are going out through the roof of the hen house, and it is time to take to the tall timber, hide out in the tules, and try to become pygmies in the pigweeds to confuse the issue further.

Let us not allow the same thing to happen again. OPA was killed with amendments last summer. Of course, we tried to revive it, but it simply would not work. Sure enough, the President had to inter the corpse, but let us not have the same thing happen again. Let us make it clear that on this amendment a vote to retain the proviso as it is is a vote to kill OPA as of April 30, according to General Fleming.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. TAYLOR], to strike out the proviso beginning in line 21, on page 6, as amended. On this question the yeas and nays have been ordered. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll.

Mr. WHERRY. I announce that the Senator from Kansas [Mr. REED] is necessarily absent and is paired with the Senator from New York [Mr. WAGNER].

The Senator from New Jersey [Mr. SMITH] is absent because of illness and the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. ROBERTSON] is necessarily absent on State business.

Mr. LUCAS. I announce that the Senator from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY] is en route to Waco, Tex., to be present on the occasion of the awarding of an honorary degree to President Truman by Baylor University on Thursday, March 6. The Senator from Texas is an alumnus of Baylor University.

The Senator from Mississippi [Mr. EASTLAND] and the Senator from New York [Mr. WAGNER] are necessarily absent.

The Senator from California [Mr. DOWNEY] and the Senator from Maryland [Mr. TYDINGS] are absent because of illness.

The Senator from New York [Mr. WAGNER] has a general pair with the Senator from Kansas [Mr. REED].

If present and voting, the Senator from California [Mr. DOWNEY] and the Senator from New York [Mr. WAGNER] would vote "yea."

The result was announced—yeas 29, nays 58, as follows:

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Idaho wish to offer his other amendment now?

Mr. TAYLOR. No. As I understand, the other amendment should be offered at a later time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If the Senator wishes to change the amount in this section he should offer his amendment now.

Mr. TAYLOR. No, Mr. President.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment on page 6, beginning in line 21, as amended.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

AMERICAN AIR POWER

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, on several occasions in the past I have drawn the attention of the Senate to conditions existing with reference to American air power abroad. An article entitled "Will Russia Rule the Air?" by W. B. Courtney, appearing in Collier's magazine of January 25, 1947, is most interesting and should be brought to the attention of the Congress. The subtitle, reading as follows, is especially interesting:

Who dominates the ocean of the air will control the world tomorrow. The race is on. It's conceivable that we could lose it—other nations are already leaving us behind. Here are startling facts—a survey of supreme importance to the future of every American.

I ask unanimous consent that the article be included in the RECORD, in connection with my remarks.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

WILL RUSSIA RULE THE AIR?

(By W. B. Courtney)

(Who dominates the ocean of the air will control the world tomorrow. The race is on. It's conceivable that we could lose it—other nations are already leaving us behind. Here are startling facts—a survey of supreme importance to the future of every American.)

One hundred and seventy-two years ago come April 18, on a night when danger threatened, a patriot hung two lanterns in the tower of the Old North Church in Boston.

Every American child early learns the story. The lanterns were a prearranged signal for which Paul Revere watched from the opposite shore—"Ready to ride and spread the alarm. One, if by land, and two, if by sea."

Their faint gleams across the dark Charles River, summoning the country folk to assemble, united against a common peril, have never gone out. The light they made in that New England spring midnight has lived as a spiritually illuminated call for Americans, old and new, of whatever race or faith, to unite.

The time has come to hang a third lantern aloft.

For the Old North Church, substitute the Capitol in Washington. For the patriot of 1775, substitute the Eightieth Congress of the United States. And to the two lanterns add the third for "if by air."

We've got to get together again.

In the air, a grave hazard is clouding over the United States today.

The danger is not, primarily, one of war.

There is a justification for a hope—if not yet for a firm belief—that war may have gone for good. But the possibility of war, and its unsure fortunes, must still be reckoned an unpredictable part of the future of any nation.

The danger, for the time being, lurks in peace. All thinking men know that peace must bear inherent risks and problems no less complex than those of war. The United States can lessen those risks. Little needs to be done; just a resolute uniting—akin to Concord and Lexington. The means are in our hands. We invented and developed them.

Unfortunately, they are not in our hands alone. During the war we shared our means with friends who, becoming our rivals in peace, have turned them against us. In an economic and political sense their widespread custody now stiffens the talk of foreign statesmen and the confidence of foreign militarists. The greatest stalling in diplomatic history is now taking place. It has this reason behind it:

Our third lantern is to signal not the imminent approach of a foe by stealth in the night but the first lap of a race. It is a great world race, paced by historic precedents. It is no less an actual race because it has not yet reached full public knowledge and debate. It is supremely necessary, then, for Americans to recognize the race.

This race is for command of another ocean, upon the shore of which mankind now chafes; the ocean of the air—the ocean with the coast line that stands on edge. Its conquest requires vision, but is no longer visionary. The beach has been consolidated. Brain, courage, and soul brought man to it. Now he is preparing to shove off.

The stake is prodigious.

Victory in the race will gain for the winner moral, economic, and political world leadership.

The race can be won without another war. The United States had the best chance of winning it. But the United States is no longer running in first place. Only three nations have the requisite might, size, and resources to compete at all—Great Britain, Russia, and the United States.

The recent war did not cause the three-way race, although the last bomb dropped on the Axis was its starting gun. What the war did was lend urgency to fantastic advances of science which, becoming available for use or misuse by governments, made such a race inevitable. For shadows, rising out of long past centuries, had written an old lesson in new skies. It is that a basic new world pattern begins to unfold in men's affairs with each advent of a truly revolutionary basic new power.

The new power is air power—suddenly full grown by the infusion of atomic power. Not air power in its partial military sense, but in its complete sense of airfaring; in the sense of the relationship that sea power bore to the importance of seafaring nations.

Before the dawn of history, man guided his boats along coastal outlines; or, at the most venturesome, to visible islands. He was afraid to leave the familiar sight of land. About 2000 B. C., from the land of Canaan on the eastern Mediterranean, the Phoenicians took the most imaginative and daring step of ancient times, and pushed out straight across the markless waters.

ADVENT OF INTERNATIONALISM

A new power was born—sea power. A new character was made available for nations—seafaring. A new relationship between ocean-separated countries was created—the first genuine internationalism.

The seafaring Phoenicians ruled Mediterranean commerce, and even traded as far away as the East Indies and the Baltic. Greece, Rome, Turkey, and the Italian city states were helped by sea power in their flourishing years; and the seafaring Hanseatic League spread prosperity through north Europe. By the sixteenth century the race for leadership in the design then fully spread out by the seafaring age of discovery was intense. England finally won command of the ocean of water that had fixed the pattern; and held it against Holland, Denmark, France, and Germany.

England's dominion for 300 years over palm and pine in world affairs, her famous balance of power policy, were rooted in command of the ocean.

The parallels are inescapably plain.

The winner of air-ocean command will be the Britannia of future years; but immensely more potent on this shrunken globe. The lesser airfaring nations will subsist by her grace.

POLITICAL SWING AS SHOWN BY GALLUP POLL

Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina. Mr. President, earlier today the senior Senator from New Mexico [Mr. HATCH] had something to say in regard to the failure of some persons to appreciate the work the President of the United States is doing today. I think the people as a whole appreciate what he is doing. In that connection let me say that I hold in my hand the Gallup poll which was published today in the Washington Post. It reads as follows:

THE GALLUP POLL—DEMOCRATS IN SHARP RALLY; NOW POLL 51 PERCENT IN SURVEY—PARTY STATUS GAINS 6 PERCENTAGE POINTS SINCE RECENT LOW

(By George Gallup, director, American Institute of Public Opinion)

PRINCETON, N. J., March 4.—Republican leaders who have been viewing the 1948 Presidential election picture with rose-colored glasses had better take them off.

For the swing of voters' sentiment in recent weeks has been back toward the Democratic Party—sharply.

In fact, if a Presidential election were being held today, 51 percent—a majority—say they would prefer to cast their votes for the Democratic Party, 49 percent for the Republican Party.

This means that the Democratic Party has regained in Presidential party support 6 percentage points from its post-Roosevelt low right after the November elections.

A lot will of course depend on the candidates, both the Republican and the Democratic, and the question of candidates was not a part of today's survey.

HAS SLIGHT MAJORITY

The facts in today's story are based on a question dealing with party preferences in a Presidential election today—aside from who the candidates may be.

Research experience during the past 11 years indicates that polls of this kind provide the best index of party strength throughout the Nation.

Democratic Party strength sagged to its lowest point in a poll by the institute right after the November elections. At that time, 45 percent said they would prefer a Democrat in a Presidential election then.

From that point on, Democratic Party strength has been climbing.

These facts are shown in the following table giving replies in periodic surveys on the question:

"If a Presidential election were being held today, which party would you vote for—the Democratic or the Republican?"

Major party vote

	Democratic	Republican
	Percent	Percent
1944 election	54	46
August 1945	58	42
February 1946	55	45
May	52½	47½
July	49	51
September	50	50
October	47	53
November (postelection)	45	55
December	47	53
January 1947	50	50
Today	51	49

Certainly one of the contributing factors (but not necessarily the primary one) in the Democratic recovery as shown above is the rising popularity of President Truman, who was found at an all-time low in popularity before the November elections.

From a low in October of 32 percent approving the way Mr. Truman was handling his job, the President's rating soared 16 percentage points—to 48 percent. This rise was reported by the institute in early February.

Whether the movement toward the Democratic Party will continue is a question which only the future can answer.

Meanwhile, the Democrats find themselves in a vastly different position today from what they were a few short months ago, when some observers were handing the Presidency to anyone the Republicans might choose to put up.

Readers should be reminded that it is not popular votes but electoral votes which elect Presidents. Because of the peculiar situation which exists in the South, where the overwhelming majority of popular votes go to the Democratic candidate, the Democrats normally need slightly more than 50 percent of the popular vote for the Nation as a whole in order to win enough electoral votes to elect their man.

Mr. President, if my memory serves me correctly, a former Gallup poll was quoted by the Republicans last year, just before the election, almost as if it were the Bible.

In the Gallup poll which I have just read to the Senate, I notice that Mr. Truman's rating has risen 16 percentage points. I think it would be well to call the attention of the Nation to what the people are thinking about the President. I wish it were possible to print in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD the picture which appears at the top of the article I have read, for it is most informative. However, I understand it is not possible to have illustrations printed in the RECORD. That is unfortunate, for I believe the picture would convey an excellent idea of the swing in the sentiment of the people throughout the Nation.

Immediately after the election I predicted that the Senators across the aisle would handle matters in such a way that when they got through labor would not be satisfied, capital would not be satisfied, and nobody would be satisfied. I think that prediction has about come true. If we give them a few more months, we shall not have to even make any speeches when the campaign begins in 1948.

NOMINATION OF DAVID E. LILIENTHAL

Mr. STEWART. Mr. President, I desire to read a letter which is of interest in connection with the matter of the confirmation of the nomination of David E. Lilienthal. The letter turned up during the hearings before the Senate section of the Joint Committee on Atomic Energy. The letter is from the Commerce Clearing House, Inc., of Chicago. It was filed in the record of the hearings before that committee the other day by Mr. Lilienthal himself, according to my information, and it was done in an effort to explain why Mr. Lilienthal, in violation of the plain provisions of Wisconsin law, was receiving compensation from two sources at the same time. In other words, he had a position on the Wisconsin Public Service Commission, under the State of Wisconsin, and at the same time he continued to represent the Commerce Clearing House, of Chicago, a client of his.

The letter is dated February 5, 1931. I call attention to that date because it is exactly 7 days before Mr. Lilienthal was employed by the State of Wisconsin to serve the Wisconsin Public Service Commission, then called the Wisconsin Railroad Commission. The letter reads as follows:

COMMERCE CLEARING HOUSE, INC.,
Chicago, February 5, 1931.

DEAR MR. LILIENTHAL: Following your report to me yesterday that you would like to accept the position of member of the Wisconsin Railroad Commission, provided your appointment is confirmed, I am glad to inform you that we should be willing to give you a leave of absence for a year, with an option to renew the absence the second year.

It is understood that you will render no personal services for us during this period and will receive no compensation from us. The editorial work heretofore performed by you and carried on in your office by assistants under your direction is to be continued by them during your absence, pursuant to this arrangement.

Your present weekly check from us of $385 will be reduced initially to $240 per week. This check will be drawn directly to you to avoid unnecessary bookkeeping and is to reimburse you for liabilities (such as rent, salaries, etc.) heretofore assumed by you primarily to carry on our work. In addition to such reimbursement, these weekly checks drawn to you during your absence will include a margin above reimbursement as part payment for your past services, particularly in the training of assistants to carry on this editorial work. We estimate this sum to be $2,000 per year, although it may be less. Your right to the reimbursement of payments above provided for is not, and will not, be in any way affected by the extent to which we market the service.

COMMERCE CLEARING HOUSE, INC.,
WM. KIXMILLER, President.

Accepted:

DAVID E. LILIENTHAL.

Mr. President, that concludes the letter. I read it in order to emphasize the fact that the young lady, whose name I do not recall now, but who testified at the hearings a few days ago and said she was Mr. Lilienthal's secretary at that time, stated that she and two other clerks worked in the office for Mr. Lilienthal before he was employed by the Wisconsin Railroad Commission and for 18 or 19 months thereafter, and that for that service to Mr. Lilienthal they were paid. Her salary, as I recall, was $28 a week, the second clerk received $24 a week, and the third about $17.50 a week, very small salaries.

I read this letter in corroboration of her testimony to the effect that for a year and a half, in violation of law, Mr. Lilienthal continued to draw compensation from the Commerce Clearing House, his client, during the period following his appointment on the Railroad Commission of Wisconsin.

Mr. KNOWLAND. Mr. President, will the Senator from Tennessee yield?

Mr. STEWART. I yield to the Senator from California.

Mr. KNOWLAND. I do not know whether the Senator has been closely following the hearings before the Senate section of the Atomic Energy Committee, but the evidence presented before that committee indicates quite clearly, I believe, that there was no effort to hide the fact that Mr. Lilienthal had such arrangements with the Commerce Clearing House. To the contrary, there is a telegram in the RECORD from the then Governor of Wisconsin, Phil La Follette, saying that a full disclosure had been made of these arrangements, and that they were well known. The testimony before the committee indicates that there was no attempt to hide the arrangement to which the Senator has referred, and the letter itself was offered as evidence before the committee by Mr. Lilienthal.

Mr. STEWART. I had understood the situation to be exactly as related by the Senator from California, but certainly he does not take the position that Governor La Follette had a right to give Mr. Lilienthal permission to violate the law.

Mr. KNOWLAND. No, and of course that would be a matter of interpretation. I do not think Mr. Lilienthal maintains, nor do I think the evidence supports the contention, that Governor La Follette gave any permission to violate the law of Wisconsin. To the contrary, the other interpretation which might be placed upon it is that there was no violation of the law of Wisconsin.

Mr. STEWART. The Senator read the law of Wisconsin that was placed in the RECORD, did he not?

Mr. KNOWLAND. Yes.

Mr. STEWART. It provided that no man should serve on the Railroad Commission who was employed in any other occupation.

Mr. KNOWLAND. I did not intend to get into a full-time debate on this subject at this time, except that I wanted to keep the record straight regarding the testimony before the committee.

Mr. STEWART. The Senator said it was a matter of interpretation, and I was proceeding to interpret it. When the law says no man can follow any other occupation, that covers every sort of situation that can be named. It means not only another position of public trust but any other employment. The purpose is manifold. But we will not take time to discuss it now. I read this letter to emphasize the fact that Mr. Lilienthal served two masters, that he was otherwise employed at the same time he was employed by the Wisconsin Railroad Commission, that he was also accepting remuneration or fees by reason of being employed by a private concern, and that that was in violation of the absolutely plain wording of the Wisconsin law.

Mr. President, I should like to read an editorial which appeared in the Washington Times-Herald today, entitled "These Days," by George E. Sokolsky. He says:

Whatever may be Senator McKELLAR'S faults, he never sought patronage from TVA. Whatever may be the cause of his opposition to David Lilienthal, it has never been due to the fact that Lilienthal refused McKELLAR patronage.

Yet the lie has been spread, repeated, reiterated, retailed, and retold that McKELLAR is a patronage hunter and that Lilienthal is an angel-pure reformer who gives no patronage to Senators. Let's have a look at the record:

On February 19, 1945, before a senatorial committee, David Lilienthal testified:

"Mr. LILIENTHAL. I am convinced no one can point to any instance in which the TVA employees or anyone connected with TVA has participated in politics.

"Senator McKELLAR. I am equally confident that I have never attempted to introduce any political matter into the TVA from the very beginning to the present time."

On June 20, 1946, the following colloquy took place (the chairman is Senator McKELLAR):

"The CHAIRMAN. In 1945 you were present before the committee and I asked you a question and I want to ask that question again, now.

"Did I ever recommend any human being to you or to your authority, so far as you know, to hold any office in your organization or any position in your organization?"

Speaking of TVA:

"Mr. LILIENTHAL. Senator, so far as I can recall, and I think I would recall, you have never urged the appointment of any individual.

"The CHAIRMAN. I am sure that is correct, and I want to thank you for that statement.

"Mr. LILIENTHAL. If there are any exceptions I believe they would be purely formal recommendations."

The editorial continues and states that the committee had to investigate this proposition of patronage-seeking by Senator McKELLAR:

It has held hearings at which some lauded Lilienthal to the pearly gates of heaven beyond the just deserts of any human being, while other condemned him as a traitor in sheep's wool.

His friends assumed that anyone who praised him is a candidate for celestial honors, while those who opposed him are in a deep conspiracy to rob the United States of a great mind, a noble personality, a paragon of perfection.

Recital of hyperbole is not investigation.

The editorial then suggests that the committee should undertake an investigation of the Southern Conference for Human Welfare, which was adverted to before it. I know nothing about it. I was not present. The editorial continues:

In the early days of the New Deal, such congressional committees as those headed by Senator Hugo Black or Senator Robert La Follette were not so squeamish about the feelings of persons alive or dead. They investigated with a deep and barbed probe.

These current Republicans are either too lazy, too incompetent, or too gentlemanly. The fact is that they are investigating nothing.

It is important that the voters who elected these Republicans to office know that the Republican Senators, particularly some of the freshmen, are not functioning as a political party, but are individually submitting to pressures by so-called liberal groups which kept them out of office for 14 years and are splitting them into splinters with the object of achieving their defeat in 1948.

Mr. President, I ask that the remainder of the editorial be printed in the RECORD as a part of my remarks.

There being no objection, the remainder of the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

The honeymoon for freshmen Senators is over. Some freshmen Senators, who are so wet behind the ears that they cannot read a bill without instruction, refuse to accept the advice, counsel, and direction of their elders, because they figure that they will shop around for support that will give them advantage in the New York City headlines and in the weeklies published in New York for national consumption.

In the Lilienthal matter, some of these boys are the carriers of the lie about McKELLAR's patronage, and they will have to keep far away from patronage themselves hereafter lest the adage concerning those who live in glass houses be applied to them.

URGENT DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATIONS

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 1968) making appropriations to supply urgent deficiencies in certain appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1947, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The clerk will state the next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations.

The next amendment was, under the heading "Independent Offices," on page 7, after line 1, to insert:

FEDERAL SECURITY AGENCY

BUREAU OF EMPLOYEES' COMPENSATION

Employees' compensation fund: For an additional amount, fiscal year 1947, for "Employees' compensation fund", $3,474,000, to be expended in accordance with the provisions of Public Law No. 650, Seventy-ninth Congress, second session, and the Federal Employees' Compensation Act of 1916, as amended.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Veterans' Administration," on page 7, line 14, before the word "Provided," to strike out "$135,000,000" and insert "$165,000,000."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the heading "Title II—Reductions in Appropriations and Authorizations—Executive Office of the President," on page 9, line 9, after the word "affairs," to strike out the words "placed in liquidation" and insert "shall be entirely liquidated."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 9, after line 10, to strike out:

Salaries and expenses, Office of Price Administration functions, Office of Temporary Controls, 1947, $9,000,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 9, after line 13, to strike out:

Salaries and expenses, Office of War Mobilization functions, Office of Temporary Controls, 1947, $60,000.

And insert in lieu thereof the following:

Salaries and expenses, Economic Stabilization, Office of War Mobilization and Reconversion functions, Office of Temporary Controls, 1947, $44,000.

Salaries and expenses, guaranteed annual wage plans, Office of War Mobilization and Reconversion functions, Office of Temporary Controls, 1946–1947, $16,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Independent Offices," on page 11, after line 11, to strike out:

Military and naval compensation, Veterans' Administration, $16,693.29.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Federal Works Agency," on page 14, line 5, after "(national defense)," to strike out "$1,897,030" and insert "$2,101,972."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 14, line 7, after "(national defense)", to strike out "$278,158" and insert "$282,431."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Treasury Department," on page 20, line 24, after the word "fund", to strike out "$1,000,000" and insert "$1,280,000."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 21, line 1, after "Procurement Division", to strike out "$1,483,480.02" and insert "$1,323,480.02."

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That completes the committee amendments. Are there any further amendments to be offered to the bill?

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. President, on page 9, line 7, I move to strike out "$2,400,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$1,200,000."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment submitted by the Senator from Arizona.

Mr. HAYDEN. The purpose of the amendment is to restore a budget estimate, and I shall take the time to make a statement to the Senate. Perhaps the shortest way of explaining the amendment is by reading from the letter written by General Fleming, who has charge of these matters, as to what the effect of the legislation would be.

In brief, it means that the activity now carried on by the Civilian Production Administration allocating materials to veterans' housing will come to an end at the end of this month. There will not be sufficient money to carry it along any further. This is what the general says:

The most important activity of CPA, the activity requiring the bulk of the personnel, is the assistance rendered the veterans emergency housing program. In the hearings before the committee it was pointed out that the OTC carries out the following functions in connection with the housing program:

1. Administering the construction limitation order which prevents the use of critical building materials in nonhousing projects that are not essential and can be deferred.

2. Increasing the production of critical building materials through channeling raw materials and equipment to the producers of these scarce items.

3. Obtaining compliance with the regulations required to carry out the housing program.

4. Auditing production records of manufacturers who have been receiving premium payments for increased production under the premium payment plan of the Housing Expediter.

It is obvious that the veterans' emergency housing program cannot continue without these supporting activities.

These functions that CPA has been carrying on require a large staff for the balance of this fiscal year but a very much smaller staff thereafter. The CPA does not receive any reimbursement from the Housing Expediter for performing these functions. Consequently, the reduction in funds from the $1,200,000 rescission, which the President proposed to the Congress, to $2,400,000 voted by the House of Representatives and carried in this report, coupled with the mandatory liquidation requirement, would necessitate a cessation of this activity in support of the housing program completely on March 31 by CPA.

This expressed intent cannot in fact be carried out. The funds that will remain available for CPA functions of OTC if the bill is passed in its present form will be so restricted that it will be necessary to send dismissal notices immediately to all CPA employees engaged in the administration of nonhousing limitation order and the other related housing activities. Accordingly, it is urgent that the mandatory liquidation proviso be removed from the bill and the rescission amount be reduced from $2,400,000 to $1,200,000.

That is the situation. If Senators wish to provide that there shall be no further control of material used in veterans' housing, they should vote against my amendment; because otherwise the Administration will immediately give dismissal notices to all engaged in it, and that activity will cease at the end of this month.

Mr. HILL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HAYDEN. I yield.

Mr. HILL. In other words, as I understand, if the bill now before the Senate is passed without the Senator's amendment, all the Government's efforts and activities to help promote further veterans' housing will be ended. Is that correct?

Mr. HAYDEN. A key activity of the Government is allocating material to veterans' housing. If there is no allocation of materials, and no authority to do that, and no one does it, the materials will go into other types of construction, and not into veterans' housing.

Mr. HILL. The average veteran is very much limited in what he can pay for a house. As I recall the figures, the average veteran cannot afford to pay more than $4,300 or $4,500 for a house. If we do not adopt the Senator's amendment, then there will be no allocation of materials to the veteran and the materials will, of course, go to industrial and commercial construction, so that the industrialists, the men who want to build houses or build for commercial purposes, will buy up all the materials and there will be none for the veterans. Is not that correct?

Mr. HAYDEN. That is undoubtedly true, because the necessity for this order has been demonstrated over and over again by the number of attempts which have been made to violate it, and the necessity of prosecuting persons who are anxious to get the materials for commercial purposes.

Mr. HILL. Surely the veteran cannot compete with a person who wants to build for commercial purposes, or with an industry that wants to build for industrial purposes. Is not that true?

Mr. HAYDEN. There can be no doubt about that.

Mr. HILL. And there will be no materials for the veterans. Is not that a fact?

Mr. HAYDEN. That is correct.

Mr. HILL. So this would be the death knell to veterans' housing.

Mr. CORDON. Mr. President, does the Senator have at hand information as to the number of CPA personnel engaged in the allocation of materials for veterans' housing?

Mr. HAYDEN. I do not happen to have it at hand at the moment, but I know it is the larger part of their activities.

Mr. CORDON. May I make one further observation?

Mr. HAYDEN. Certainly.

Mr. CORDON. I am very much in sympathy with the Senator's views. I find myself in this instance not in accord with some of my own colleagues; which I regret.

Mr. HAYDEN. The Senator asked me about the number. Mr. Houston, who handled this matter, states, on page 42 of the Senate hearings, as follows:

Because our largest activity is in connection with the housing program. Our field offices are devoted almost exclusively to the veterans' housing program. If we are forced to reduce our employment to some 700 people—

That is all that will be left—

we could not handle this construction limitation order. With this severe cut in the number of people, we could not retain the offices we have in the field, and would not be able to handle the number of applications which come in, and the number of compliance cases which we have coming in.

It does not say how many are engaged in it, but they will all be gone except 700.

Mr. CORDON. Will the Senator further yield?

Mr. HAYDEN. I yield.

Mr. CORDON. Is the Senator in agreement with me in my understanding of the legal effect of what was done by committee? As I understand, the President's budget recommended that there be a rescission of $1,200,000 of funds heretofore appropriated for CPA. The House doubled that amount and made the rescission $2,400,000. At the same time, in addition to taking away the extra $1,200,000 from the appropriated funds, it also added the proviso that the CPA be discontinued, and its affairs placed in liquidation not later than June 30, 1947. I ask the Senator to give me his views on the matter. As I understand, the proviso adopted by the House simply requires a discontinuance of CPA on the last day of June, and the commencement of the liquidation of the office at that time. The Senate Appropriations Committee amended the language of the House bill by providing that the CPA shall be discontinued and its affairs entirely liquidated not later than June 30, 1947.

Mr. HAYDEN. That is correct; so that the amount of money that remains available must be used to a large extent for liquidation. That being true, that is the reason why General Fleming states that he will have to proceed to liquidate immediately, and he will wind up the agency by the end of this month. There will be no more after that date.

Mr. CORDON. Then if the Senator's motion prevails and the rescission figure is reduced from $2,400,000 to $1,200,000, it would mean, if I understand correctly—and again I ask for the Senator's judgment—that while the rescission recommended by the President would be adopted, there would still be an obligation on CPA within the limits so set, not only to function, but also completely to conclude its operations, pay its terminal leave amounting to some $1,400,000, and completely liquidate by June 30.

Mr. HAYDEN. That is why I had intended, if the amendment I am now offering were adopted, to move to strike out the proviso. Otherwise, the amount of money contained in the budget estimate contemplated for carrying on the work until June 30, with liquidation after that date, would no longer avail.

Mr. CORDON. Will the Senator yield further?

Mr. HAYDEN. Yes.

Mr. CORDON. I desire to observe that I am willing to go along with the Senator on either of the two roads, but not on both. I am ready to go along with him on the reduction from $2,400,000 to $1,200,000 and require complete liquidation by June 30, or retain the amount of $2,400,000 and delete the requirement for complete liquidation by that date.

Mr. HAYDEN. I have made the first motion. Let us see what happens to that.

Mr. BRIDGES. Mr. President, has the Senator from Arizona completed his statement?

Mr. HAYDEN. Yes.

Mr. BRIDGES. Before the Senate votes on the question let me say that both the House and the Senate committees listened to the evidence in this case. It is not the intention of the Senate Appropriations Committee, or of the House committee, so far as I know, to interfere in any way with the duties imposed on CPA respecting veterans' housing except to the extent of saying that these agencies must be wound up at some time. We have given them a reasonable amount of money. The present activity is not provided for in the law. It comes about as the result of a directive by the Housing Expediter in which he transferred the duty to CPA. Then the President transferred CPA to the Office of Temporary Controls. So it was done by directive in the one case by the Housing Expediter and in the second case by the President. In case the agency now in charge of the work does not have sufficient money to do so, and it is necessary to continue the work afterward in the interest of an equitable administration of the rules and regulations as to veterans' housing, all that would happen would be that the Housing Expediter himself would perform the duties he is now delegating to a temporary agency. What I am seeking is a method of allowing the temporary agencies to carry on so far as they can and when they are dissolved, if it is necessary to carry on further, then to have the Housing Expediter take over the duties which he has delegated by directive to an agency.

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BRIDGES. I yield.

Mr. HAYDEN. Does the Senator deem it to be good business to delegate the authority in the first place? Was not such delegation a saving of public money? Was not the agency to which the delegation was made a proper agency to undertake the work? Was it not better for the Housing Administrator to do it in that way than to attempt to set up his own organization?

Mr. BRIDGES. I will say to the Senator from Arizona that the Civilian Production Administration set up the organization. One or the other agency had to do the work. I think it should have been done originally by the Housing Expediter himself. But it has been done by the CPA. We have no quarrel with what has been done to date, except that we believe that these temporary agencies must have some termination date, and that if it is necessary to continue any of the duties, there is no reason why the Housing Expediter, who is in that business, should not take over and carry on the duties and protect the veterans' housing.

Mr. HAYDEN. If the Senator will further yield to me, I may say that it seemed to me at the time when the Housing Expediter appeared before our committee, that he was seeking to save money for the Treasury by using the existing organization, rather than to recruit an entirely new force, inexperienced and incapable of immediate action, whereas the use of the existing force was a matter of economy so far as the Government was concerned. I cannot see how a new organization can be set up and act as efficiently as an existing organization can. Does the Senator agree with me that the effect of the cut in the amount—or the increase in the rescission and the adoption of the proviso—will be that the agency will liquidate this month?

Mr. BRIDGES. No; I would not say that the agency will liquidate this month, but I should say that it will have to carry on. The Senator said, as I recall, that the agency would carry on with 700 employees. Was that his statement?

Mr. HAYDEN. The agency said that it would reduce the number of its employees to 700.

Mr. BRIDGES. As I understand, CPA now has 2,900 employees, of whom about 2,000 are working on this particular subject.

Mr. HAYDEN. CPA has 700 left in its entire organization.

Mr. BRIDGES. And there would be a substantial reduction in the number of employees working on this matter. But I still think the agency could carry on. If not, then they should carry on as long as they could do so effectively, and then the work would merely be transferred back to the organization which directed CPA to take it over in the first place.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Arizona [Mr. HAYDEN] in line 7, page 9, to strike out "$2,400,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$1,200,000."

The amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Are there any further amendments to be offered?

Mr. BRIDGES. Mr. President, on page 8, under the heading "Treasury Department," in line 7, appears the figure "$3,000,000." I have received a letter from Mr. Snyder, Secretary of the Treasury, who says that from an analysis of the method of refunding tax payments and other payments, he believes that if $520,000 were added to that figure it would result in saving several times that amount. The saving would come through reduction in interest paid on the tax refunds that would be delayed in case the personnel were cut to the bone, which would result in an immense slowing up of tax refunds. That question was not presented to the committee, but I have a letter from Mr. Snyder, which, if the Senate wishes to take the time, I should be glad to have read. I think he makes a pretty good case. I therefore offer an amendment on page 8, line 7, after the word "expenses", to strike out "$3,000,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$3,520,000", which is the figure asked by the Secretary of the Treasury, in order that this work may be expedited.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BRIDGES].

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. President, I hope the amendment may be adopted. The situation is this: In January of every year, when tax deductions have been made by various corporations from their pay rolls, they discover that they have paid into the Treasury more money than is required, so they immediately apply early in the year for refunds of such taxes, to which they are entitled. From the 15th of March on, if the refunds are not paid, they bear interest at 6 percent. One can readily see that with the billions of dollars involved in tax refunds, it does not take long to eat up a large sum of money. So I am in entire accord with the Senator from New Hampshire that this amendment would effect a material saving to the taxpayers, because it takes just as long to write the checks and settle the refunds a year from now as it would to do it now. In the meantime we should be paying interest at 6 percent.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from New Hampshire.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BRIDGES. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD at this point the letter written by the Secretary of the Treasury in justification of the amendment.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY,
Washington, March 4, 1947.

Hon. STYLES BRIDGES,
Chairman, Senate Committee on Appropriations, United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: On January 24 President Truman sent to the Speaker of the House a supplemental estimate of appropriation of $3,520,100 to enable the Treasury Department's Division of Disbursement to continue its activities during the remainder of the current fiscal year. This amount is exclusive of $762,900 required for increases in pay of employees under Public Law 390, Seventy-ninth Congress.

The House Appropriations Committee reduced the amount requested to $3,000,000. This item appears on page 8, line 7, of H. R. 1968, as introduced in the Senate on February 28.

The Treasury did not appeal this reduction to your committee until a careful study could be made of the effect of the reduction on payments to Government beneficiaries, claimants, and public creditors, and what steps could be taken to adjust administrative machinery to meet the problem. I have just received a report from the Fiscal Assistant Secretary of the Treasury which causes me great concern and which I feel should be brought to your attention. Apparently, on the basis of House Report No. 36, page 4, the House Appropriations Committee's action was predicated upon the rate of expenditures during the first 6 months of the year and continuing during the last 6 months. This would have been a proper basis of computation except for the fact that refunds of excess withholdings of pay by employers for income taxes are made by the Treasury almost entirely between January 1 and June 30.

During the past couple of years the Treasury has made a special effort to speed up its machinery for making refunds of withheld taxes with substantial savings in interest paid on such refunds. As you know, the Treasury is required by law to pay interest at the rate of 6 percent per annum from March 15 on all claims which are not paid prior to April 16. The savings in interest by speeding up the refunding operations, covering taxes for the calendar years 1943, 1944, and 1945, are indicated below:

Total number of individual income-tax returns filed	43,650,000	46,000,000	47,000,000
Number of refunds paid	16,000,000	22,000,000	30,250,000
Amount of refunds paid	$587,000,000	$1,000,000,000	$1,400,000,000
Time used to complete refunds from Mar. 15	1 year	7 months	3½ months
Interest paid on refunds	$22,000,000	$17,000,000	$4,000,000

It will be noted that for the calendar year 1943 the Treasury made 16,000,000 tax refunds, amounting to $587,000,000. It required a year from March 15 to complete these payments, at an interest cost of $22,000,000. For the following year, 1944, the number of refunds increased to 22,000,000 and the amount to $1,000,000,000. It took 7 months to complete these payments, at an interest cost of $17,000,000. For 1945 the number of refunds paid increased to 30,250,000 and the amount to $1,400,000,000. The time used to complete these refunds was reduced to 3½ months and the interest cost was reduced to $4,600,000. In other words, while the tax refunds for the calendar year 1945 (paid in the fiscal year 1946) were $813,000,000 more than for 1943, the interest paid on such refunds was $17,400,000 less than the amount paid on the 1943 returns. This saving in interest was accomplished by expediting the payment of the tax refunds.

At the present time the collectors of internal revenue are busily engaged in the scheduling for payment by the Division of Disbursement of tax-refund claims relating to the calendar year 1946. It is estimated that there will be 30,500,000 such claims, involving the total sum of $1,300,000,000. The Treasury's plans were to complete these payments before June 30. Unless the Treasury can carry out these plans, there will be a loss to the Government in interest running somewhere between five and ten millions of dollars.

Unless the appropriation for the Division of Disbursement, appearing on page 8, line 7, of H. R. 1968 is increased to $3,520,000 (assuming also that the Congress will appropriate $762,900 in the current fiscal year to cover the pay increases under Public Law 390), it will be necessary for the Treasury immediately to begin to reduce the personnel in the Division of Disbursement. Since it would not be feasible to postpone payments to veterans, social-security benefits, pensions, pay rolls, purchase invoices, etc., it will be necessary for the Treasury to defer payment of a large number of tax-refund claims until the 1948 appropriation becomes available on July 1, 1947.

Before taking this action, in view of the serious consequences, I thought it advisable to acquaint you with the situation. It seems to me that there are three things which you may wish to consider (1) the substantial loss to the Government of somewhere between five and ten million dollars on account of increased interest charges; (2) the public dissatisfaction which will come through any delay in payment of refunds due taxpayers, and (3) the increased administrative expenses which inevitably will result through increased correspondence with persons who will be affected by the delayed payments. In connection with the last item you will also want to keep in mind that, while there will be a loss to the Government on account of interest, the withholding of the $520,000 of additional funds needed by the Division of Disbursement will not ultimately result in a saving of administrative expenses for the reason that the refund claims which are not paid this year will have to be paid next year.

In view of the foregoing, I sincerely hope that you may see your way clear to offer an amendment to H. R. 1968 increasing the appropriation for the Division of Disbursement appearing on line 7, page 8, from $3,000,000 to $3,520,000.

If there is any further information that the Department can furnish you I would greatly appreciate it if you would call me.

Very truly yours,

JOHN W. SNYDER,
Secretary of the Treasury.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill is before the Senate and open to amendment. If there be no further amendments to be proposed, the question is on the engrossment of the amendments and the third reading of the bill.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill (H. R. 1968) was read the third time and passed.

Mr. BRIDGES. Mr. President, I move that the Senate insist upon its amendments, request a conference with the House of Representatives thereon, and that the Chair appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The motion was agreed to; and the President pro tempore appointed Mr. BRIDGES, Mr. BROOKS, Mr. GURNEY, Mr. BALL, Mr. MCKELLAR, Mr. HAYDEN, and Mr. TYDINGS conferees on the part of the Senate.

THE PRESIDENTIAL TERM

The Senate resumed the consideration of the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 27), proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States relating to the terms of office of the President.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President, I inquire of the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. REVERCOMB] whether he is ready to proceed this evening.

Mr. REVERCOMB. Mr. President, I understand that we shall not be able to conclude this subject tonight. I prefer to proceed when the Senate next meets.

MASS CERTIFICATION OF DRUGS CONTAINING STREPTOMYCIN

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside and that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill 2045, which has been messaged over from the House, and I believe it is on the desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be stated by title for the information of the Senate.

The bill (H. R. 2045) to amend the Federal Food, Drug, and Cosmetic Act of June 25, 1938, as amended, by providing for the certification of batches of drugs composed wholly or partly of any kind of streptomycin, or any derivative thereof, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Maine?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the bill.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, I should like to have an explanation of the bill.

Mr. WHITE. I shall make a very brief explanation of the bill, if that will satisfy Senators.

The bill proposes to amend the Federal Food, Drug, and Cosmetic Act of June 25, 1938, by providing for the certification of batches of drugs composed wholly or partly of any kind of streptomycin, or any derivative thereof.

The bill was considered by the House Committee on Interstate Commerce, approved, and passed by the House. It is identical in its substantial provisions with a bill reported by the Senate Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, Senate bill 445. It seems to provide a larger degree of control in the food and drug officials of the Government than exists under the present law with respect to this particular drug and its derivatives.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, I have no objection to the bill. I was under the impression that it was a bill relating to taxes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, Senate bill 445 is indefinitely postponed.

EXECUTIVE SESSION

Mr. WHITE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business.

EXECUTIVE MESSAGES REFERRED

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate messages from the President of the United States submitting sundry nominations, which were referred to the Committee on Armed Services.

(For nominations this day received, see the end of Senate proceedings.)

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no reports of committees, the clerk will proceed to state the nominations on the Executive Calendar.

DIPLOMATIC AND FOREIGN SERVICE—NOMINATION PASSED OVER

The legislative clerk read the nomination of Herman B. Baruch to be Ambassador Extraordinary and Plenipotentiary of the United States of America to the Netherlands, which nomination had previously been passed over.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President, I ask that this nomination again be passed over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the nomination will be passed over.

TENNESSEE VALLEY AUTHORITY—NOMINATION REPORTED ADVERSELY

The executive clerk read the nomination of Gordon R. Clapp to be a member of the Board of Directors of the Tennessee Valley Authority.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President, I ask that this nomination be passed over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the nomination will be passed over.

Mr. HILL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WHITE. I yield.

Mr. HILL. I wonder if the Senator can give us any idea as to when it may be his disposition to consider the nomination of Mr. Clapp.

Mr. WHITE. So far as I am personally concerned, it would be agreeable at any time. I understand that there is some conflict over the nomination, and I have been requested to ask that it be passed over.

Mr. HILL. The Senator realizes that there will be some debate on this nomination. Ordinarily if there is to be controversy or debate over a nomination, we receive some notice as to when it is to be considered.

Mr. WHITE. If it is not passed over, I shall be compelled to ask for a quorum.

Mr. HILL. I am not asking for action now. I did not mean to imply that at all. When the leaders decide to take up this nomination, will it be possible to give us a little notice?

Mr. WHITE. I shall let the Senator know as soon as I know. I hope that may be very shortly.

Mr. HILL. I thank the Senator.

DIPLOMATIC AND FOREIGN SERVICE—LEWIS W. DOUGLAS

The legislative clerk read the nomination of Lewis W. Douglas to be Ambassador Extraordinary and Plenipotentiary of the United States of America to Great Britain.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is, Will the Senate advise and consent to this nomination.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President, I have been asked by the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. LANGER] to say that he has been unavoidably called from the Senate Chamber, but that if he were present and voting he would vote against the confirmation of the nomination of Mr. Douglas.

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. President, the people of Arizona are highly pleased that the President has selected a native and a resident of our State as Ambassador to the Court of St. James. We know him well as a man of rare ability and great courage, with a background of experience which makes it certain that no better choice could possibly have been made.

Lewis Douglas faces a hard task at London, but he will perform it in a manner most helpful to the United States of America, the British Empire, and the future peace of the world.

Mr. McFARLAND. Mr. President, I concur in the statement just made by my colleague in regard to Hon. Lewis W. Douglas. He is an able and fearless statesman. It is my opinion that the President made a wise choice.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is, Will the Senate advise and consent to the nomination of Lewis W. Douglas to be Ambassador Extraordinary and Plenipotentiary of the United States of America to Great Britain?

The nomination was confirmed.

UNITED NATIONS

The legislative clerk read the nomination of Warren R. Austin to be representative of the United States of America on the United Nations Commission for Conventional Armaments.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the nomination is confirmed.

That completes the calendar.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President, I ask that the President be immediately notified of all nominations confirmed this day.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the President will be notified forthwith.

RECESS TO FRIDAY

Mr. WHITE. As in legislative session, I move that the Senate stand in recess until 12 o'clock noon on Friday next.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 4 o'clock and 38 minutes p. m.) the Senate took a recess until Friday, March 7, 1947, at 12 o'clock meridian.

CONFIRMATIONS

Executive nominations confirmed by the Senate March 5 (legislative day of February 19), 1947:

DIPLOMATIC AND FOREIGN SERVICE

Lewis W. Douglas to be Ambassador Extraordinary and Plenipotentiary of the United States of America to Great Britain.

UNITED NATIONS

Warren R. Austin to be the representative of the United States of America on the United Nations Commission for Conventional Armaments.

THURSDAY, MARCH 6, 1947

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Eternal God, by whose merciful providence we behold the light of another day, we praise Thee that Thou art the spring of comfort and refreshment. With Thee every weakness can be made strength and every hindrance an inspiration. Amid chance and change and withering emotions that lead only to uncertainty and instability, constrain us to order our lives wisely.

Thou who art the light of the world, brood over the counsels of the chosen delegates of the nations. Take out of every contest the spirit of suspicion and selfishness and make unity of purpose to dominate all hearts and minds. Help them to see through the vistas of fear and doubt, and behold the morning of a world at peace and in mutual understanding. O God, grant unto our beloved soldier-statesman the assurance that right will prevail, and that "behind the dim unknown standeth God within the shadow, keeping watch above His own."

Dear Lord, let the robe of divine care be about our President, our Speaker, and all Members of the Congress. Give dignity and poise to the deliberations of Congress, with brave hearts and strong minds to face life calmly, and to do Thy will. In the name of Christ our Saviour. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of Tuesday, March 4, was read and approved.

CONTESTED-ELECTION CASE — HAROLD C. WOODWARD AGAINST THOMAS J. O'BRIEN (H. DOC. NO. 163)

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following communication from the Clerk of the House, which was read and referred to the Committee on House Administration and ordered to be printed:

OFFICE OF THE CLERK,
HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C., March 5, 1947.

The Honorable the SPEAKER,
House of Representatives.

SIR: From the contestant in the contested-election case of Harold C. Woodward against Thomas J. O'Brien for a seat in the Eightieth Congress from the Sixth Congressional District of the State of Illinois, the Clerk received on February 26, 1947, a communication citing the failure of the contestee to reply to his notice to contest said election. The communication of the contestant further raised certain questions which could only be decided by the House itself and were therefore transmitted to the Speaker of the House for disposal. This matter was, by the Speaker, referred to the House Committee on Administration for consideration.

Now comes the contestee with his answer to the notice to contest, which is transmitted herewith for reference to the committee having jurisdiction over this matter.

Very truly yours,

JOHN ANDREWS,
Clerk of the House of Representatives.

LET'S HAUL DOWN A FEW SUBVERSIVE PROFESSORS

Mr. GEARHART. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

There was no objection.

Mr. GEARHART. Mr. Speaker, in my hands I hold a photostat of a newspaper clipping from the Syracuse (N. Y.) Post-Standard of Sunday, February 16.

In this article it is revealed that one Milton Mayer, a University of Chicago professor, while addressing a meeting of One Worlders in Syracuse, unbosomed himself in the following words which I quote:

> We must haul down the American flag. And if I wanted to be vulgar and shocking, I would go even further, and say haul it down, stamp on it, and spit on it.

And this article contains the further information, equally startling, equally disconcerting, which I also quote:

> Most of the nearly 200 persons attending the meeting greeted Mayer's statement with prolonged applause.

If that is a sample of the subversive sentiments which some of our professors in some of our publicly supported and privately endowed educational institutions of our country are giving expression to, subversive sentiments to which certain of our public audiences are shouting their approval, I say it is high time that the American people begin to haul down, not the flag, but the professors who are preaching and teaching such destructive ideas.

It is pedagogic expressions of this kind, expressions of which the one I have quoted is but an example, which are constantly bringing down upon the members of a noble profession undeserved embarrassment and unmerited criticism, constantly exposing our teachers to false charges of entertaining subversive sentiments and of indulging in unpatriotic activities. The sooner we kick out of the educational world these people who fatten upon the contributions of patriotic citizens only to stab their benefactors in the back, the better off this country will be.

And incidents such as the one to which I have just called the attention of the Congress and the country reminds us forcibly that, for some reason or other, reasons quite beyond understanding, this Congress has never in the one-hundred-and-sixty-odd years of its existence passed any law to authorize Federal officials to apprehend and punish the desecrators and mutilators of the flag of the United States, though, strange to relate, heavy penalties have been imposed upon those who mutilate a 5-cent piece or disfigure the dollar goddess which emblazons our coins.

If the symbol of Old Glory, the noble sentiments which it represents, mean as much to the American people as the dollar mark on our coins, then, indeed, it is high time that the Congress of the United States enact legislation which will provide an adequate punishment for those who desecrate the flag of this Republic, visit upon them the contempt which every true-blue American has for their ilk. Such a bill I have offered to the Congress of the United States in my H. R. 234.

Let us promptly enact it and have an end to such incidents as occurred in Syracuse, and, while we are about it, let us haul down a few subversive professors, this creature from the University of Chicago, along with the rest.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GEARHART. I yield.

Mr. RANKIN. You will find those subversive professors are being subsidized by somebody who wants to destroy the Government of the United States.

Mr. GEARHART. I am not surprised to hear that.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from California has expired.

TREASURY-POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT APPROPRIATION BILL

Mr. CANFIELD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Appropriations may have until midnight Friday night to file a privileged report on the Treasury-Post Office Department appropriation bill.

There was no objection.

WORLD AFFAIRS

Mr. MUHLENBERG. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MUHLENBERG]?

There was no objection.

Mr. MUHLENBERG. Mr. Speaker, it is perhaps somewhat presumptuous for a new Member to rise to express a viewpoint on national and international affairs at some variance with remarks made on Monday last by two outstanding and often-quoted Members of the Republican majority—one to the effect that we were "dragged into this war," the other to state flatly that he is an "isolationist." These lead the general public, as I have already discovered, to the impression of a party position already taken. May I be permitted to state that many of the men who have just entered the Congress hold no such views; and that perhaps the viewpoint which deserves more the label of majority Republican opinion is one that believes the safety and security of the world is indeed our problem and the solution of that problem our real safety; that succor of starving and enslaved peoples is indeed our obligation, an obligation much greater and in the long view much sounder for our preservation than the immediate reduction either of debt or taxes.

We, close to the people, elected in many districts by the confidence of many Democrats who have lost faith in the glittering generalities and empty words of the New Deal, but who have faith in our knowledge and judgment of world affairs, shall speak for ourselves and are bound by no man. We shall use our experience to judge matters for the good of the Nation in a cooperative world where we are in truth today, and perhaps for our own selfish interests, our brother's keeper.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

Mr. REEVES asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include an editorial.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

There was no objection.

[Mr. SABATH addressed the House. His remarks appear in the Appendix.]

(Mr. SARATH asked and was given permission to revise and extend his remarks and include a resolution.)

There was no objection.

Mr. ROGERS of Florida. Mr. Speaker, on Tuesday, March 4, I filed with the Clerk a discharge petition to bring before you for consideration House bill 3, which I introduced on January 3, providing that terminal-leave bonds should be redeemable in cash at the option of the veteran, and providing for cash payments instead of bonds hereafter. This is not a complicated bill; it is just a simple piece of legislation.

It requires no hearings, since the House in the Seventy-ninth Congress unanimously endorsed cash payment and was approved by a vote of 379 to 0.

When the bill was sent to the Senate, they changed the payment of terminal leave to 5-year bonds, which was accepted by the House with the distinct understanding that the Eightieth Congress would correct this injustice and pay these bonds in cash, if requested.

When the House was considering the conference report, our now distinguished Speaker, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MARTIN] said, among other things:

If the officers could have cash, then there is no reason on earth why the private soldier should not be treated the same. After all, it is the good old private and noncom that carries the greater burden of war. If we do not give fair, equal treatment today, then the next Congress will see that the injustice is corrected. Eventually the American people will see that fair play prevails.

I hope you will sign this petition, and let us pass this bill No. 3.

Mr. D'EWART. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD and include a statement by Mr. Sylvan J. Pauly, of Montana, president of the National Wool Growers Association, before the Agriculture Committee. Mr. Pauly discusses the wool situation.

The Public Printer advises me that this statement is estimated to make 2⅓ pages of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD and will cost $165.67. Notwithstanding this fact, I ask unanimous consent that it may be printed.

ADJOURNMENT OVER

Mr. HALLECK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourns today it adjourn to meet at noon on Monday next.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Indiana?

There was no objection.

CALENDAR WEDNESDAY

Mr. HALLECK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the business in order on Calendar Wednesday of next week be dispensed with.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Indiana?

There was no objection.

PROGRAM FOR NEXT WEEK

Mr. HALLECK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute to announce the program for next week.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Indiana?

There was no objection.

Mr. HALLECK. Mr. Speaker, the Committee on Appropriations has obtained unanimous consent to have until midnight tomorrow night to file a report on the Treasury and Post Office appropriation bill. That report will be filed tomorrow, and we expect to call it up for consideration on Monday next. It is expected that general debate will continue through Monday, and that we will begin the reading of the bill on Tuesday. It is probable that that bill can be disposed of finally on Tuesday. If it is necessary to hold general debate longer than Monday, that may be done at the discretion of the committee.

When the appropriation bill is finally disposed of, we propose to call up through Wednesday and Thursday H. R. 1943, a bill to establish a permanent Nurse Corps of the Army and the Navy and to establish a Women's Medical Specialist Corps in the Army; also H. R. 1327, which was scheduled for consideration today, but on which a rule has not yet been granted, but on which it is expected that a rule will be granted. That is a bill to amend existing law to provide the privilege of renewing the expiring 5-year level premium term policies for another 5-year period; also to call up two bills from the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries that have been characterized as rather technical, but requested by the executive branch of the Government; House Joint Resolution 76, authorizing and directing the Commandant of the United States Coast Guard to waive compliance with navigation and vessel-inspection laws administered by the Coast Guard; and H. R. 1240, providing for the suspension of navigation and vessel-inspection laws, as applied to vessels operated by the War Department, upon the termination of title V, Second War Powers Act, 1942, as amended.

If those matters are disposed of by the evening of Thursday next, it is our plan to adjourn over until the following Monday.

COMMUNIST PROPAGANDA

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Mississippi?

There was no objection.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, if the attacks on me were published in decent newspapers, I would have a right to rise to a question of personal privilege, but since they were published in the Communist Daily Worker, I feel like rising to a question of personal gratification.

I notice this morning, as usual, a cartoon of me on the front page of the Communist Daily Worker, accusing me of being responsible for the Committee on Un-American Activities that is now delving into the traitorous conduct of certain elements and individuals and exposing their efforts to undermine and destroy our form of Government and our American way of life.

I am gratified indeed to have these subversives attack me and accuse me of being the worst enemy they have in this country.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Mississippi has expired.

RESTORING THE NAME OF HOOVER DAM

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on Rules I call up House Resolution 132 and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That immediately upon the adoption of this resolution it shall be in order to move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the consideration of the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 140) to restore the name of Hoover Dam, and all points of order against said joint resolution are hereby waived. That after general debate, which shall be confined to the joint resolution and shall continue not to exceed 1 hour, to be equally divided and controlled by the chairman and the ranking minority member of the Committee on Public Lands, the joint resolution shall be read for amendment under the 5-minute rule. At the conclusion of the reading of the joint resolution for amendment, the Committee shall rise and report the same to the House with such amendments as may have been adopted, and the previous question be considered as ordered on the joint resolution and amendments thereto to final passage without intervening motion except one motion to recommit.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I yield 30 minutes of my time to the gentleman from Illinois, the ranking member of the Committee on Rules [Mr. SABATH], and yield myself such time as I may use.

Mr. Speaker, this resolution would make in order the consideration of House Joint Resolution 140, to restore the name of Hoover Dam. This rule provides for 1 hour of general debate, and allows amendments to be offered under the 5-minute rule. Points of order against the joint resolution have been waived, simply as protection from dilatory action which might otherwise have arisen on technical or irrelevant points. The rights of the minority are fully protected by the provision in the rule for one motion to recommit.

House Joint Resolution 140 would restore the name of Hoover Dam. It should be pointed out, however, that Mr. Hoover has never asked that his name be restored to the dam for which he, more than any other man, was responsible. It is not as if he were seeking honor, but that we the Congress, representing the people of the United States, recognizing the propriety of such action, seek to bestow honor where honor is due.

During debate on this measure, it is my hope that all Members of this body will bear in mind that this is an unsolicited honor, and will therefore realize the impropriety of detracting from the reputation of our only living ex-President.

Political convictions are probably the most inviolable aspect of the personalities of most of us who are here, yet in most cases we cannot trace the incidents or the decisions which have brought about the political convictions that we hold so sacred. I have never doubted that every Member of Congress is deeply sincere, politically, and acts entirely within the dictates of his conscience. It is obvious that we disagree on many things, yet we are all sincere in our disagreements. Therefore, in politics we should remember always that in opposing in any way what a man thinks on particular issues we should not oppose the man personally because of the way he thinks. Here in the House of Representatives I believe this principle is firmly established. I have profound personal respect and affection for all the Members of this House, regardless of their political convictions, and I believe most of the other Members of the Congress have similar feelings in this respect.

This principle should be applied when we consider House Joint Resolution 140. I am very happy and pleased to be able to stand here today and say to you that when this matter was considered before the Committee on Rules no partisanship was displayed, that this resolution was reported unanimously, being supported by all the Democratic members of that committee. In fact, if my memory serves me right, the motion to report the resolution was made by a Democratic member of the Committee on Rules, a wonderful gesture and a fine tribute both to Mr. Hoover and to the Americanism of the great Rules Committee.

We are not attempting to honor the political convictions of ex-President Hoover, nor are we attempting to honor the political party he represented in the Presidency. We are honoring the man—a great man and a great American. To do otherwise would be inconsistent with the American principle which has always recognized and honored men for their contributions to the country. By observing this custom, we have provided an incentive for personal contributions which have made this country the greatest in the world.

As will probably be brought out in debate on this issue, the dam on the Colorado River in the Black Canyon was originally called the Hoover Dam. The name was later changed, however, for purely political reasons. Our only living ex-President was denied this token of honor to his personal greatness merely because of his political convictions. I am sure that none of us would be a party to such an injustice.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. I yield.

Mr. RANKIN. I was here when the Boulder Dam bill was passed. One of the greatest forces behind that measure was Herbert Hoover and two others were Senator Hiram Johnson and Representative Phil Swing.

For a time it was called the Hoover Dam, with the approval, I thought, of everybody in the House. When Secretary Ickes came into office, as I understand it, he changed the name to Boulder Dam. I was opposed to that change. I never voted for President Hoover, and he knows it, but nobody has ever attempted to change the name of the Wilson Dam, which was named after Woodrow Wilson. Nobody has ever attempted to change the name of the Roosevelt Dam which was named after Theodore Roosevelt. I was opposed and I made it known then that I was opposed to changing the name of this dam from Hoover Dam to Boulder Dam.

I shall vote for the resolution.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. I thank the gentleman for his contribution.

I would like to add that there have been numerous public projects and structures named after the late President, Franklin Delano Roosevelt, and there has never been any attempt, so far as I know, to change the name of any of these.

The honor originally given Mr. Hoover was not revoked in favor of doing greater honor to another, but was denied in favor of the name Boulder Dam—a name which has no significance—a dull, lifeless name.

As to the propriety of naming a public work in honor of a living person, there are other precedents. The Roosevelt Dam, the Wilson Dam, as the gentleman from Mississippi has pointed out, and the Coolidge Dam were all named in honor of men who have served in the great office of President of the United States. It is even more appropriate that we should restore the name Hoover Dam to the Boulder Canyon structure, as Herbert Hoover labored faithfully and successfully as Secretary of Commerce in the early 1920's to reconcile the conflicting interests of the States that had obstructed the building of the dam. Further, as an engineer, he interested himself in the actual construction of the dam. Does it not seem more appropriate—regardless of political consideration—to identify the structure with the name of Hoover, than to refer to it by an inanimate name with no significance.

I hold a deep respect and a warm personal regard for Mr. Hoover. It is not my intention to eulogize here, but I would like to make the observation that Herbert Hoover's life is the story of the typically American way to success.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. I yield.

Mr. RANKIN. Let me call attention to another thing. We had battle after battle over Cove Creek Dam. I remember one time when we lost every vote in Tennessee except Mr. McReynolds. One man at the other end of the Capitol who stood out for the development of Cove Creek Dam was Senator George Norris, and when that dam was finally built we named it Norris Dam. It will remain Norris Dam if I have my way about it.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. I thank the gentleman for his statement, but to continue:

Many of you have traveled the same path yourselves, and you will be able to appreciate how the son of a village blacksmith rose to the Presidency of the United States.

Orphaned when he was 7, Herbert Hoover was raised by an uncle on an Oregon farm. Later he earned his own way through Stanford University, where he received a degree in engineering. In short, Hoover was brought up the hard way. He knew poverty and the value of an honest dollar. By observation, he knew the problems of the poor. He knew that if he were to succeed, it had to be through hard work and sound management since he had no inherited power of wealth or name to ease his path. On leaving college, Hoover worked at manual labor in a mine in northern California, and later became associated with a firm of mining engineers. He remained in the job for 14 years, and during that time traveled throughout the world. He later started his own firm, which he operated until shortly before World War I. Hoover was in London at the time of the outbreak of the war. Finding many stranded American tourists, he gave unsparingly of his time and money to aid them. Before the United States entered the First World War, Hoover was appointed Administrator of Belgian Relief, an adventure which plunged him into international diplomacy and politics.

With our entrance into the war, President Woodrow Wilson, ignoring partisan politics, perceived in Hoover the logical candidate to stimulate production and aid in the conservation of food in the United States and appointed him Food Administrator in 1917.

Following the war, Hoover spent 2 years in Europe as American Relief Administrator. In this capacity, he conducted one of the most spacious humanitarian efforts in history, distributing more than $11,000,000,000 in food products in the famine-ridden lands of Europe.

In 1921 President Harding appointed Herbert Hoover Secretary of Commerce. He served in this capacity until he was nominated for the Presidency in 1928. Whether or not we agree with such a man on political views, we cannot but respect him as a man. Were he not noble, he could not have risen to such heights. It is my sincere hope that we pass this resolution to honor a man who so justly deserves it.

In recent weeks and months Mr. Hoover has been serving as the special envoy or representative of President Truman in making surveys of conditions and needs for American help in many foreign lands. A few months ago, at the age of 72, he made a trip around the earth for his Government and his President. Just last Sunday he returned from spending several weeks in Europe, and especially in Germany, where again, as the representative of his Government and his President, he made a survey of conditions there, especially as to the need of American aid for the sick and starving.

I had the pleasure of visiting with Mr. Hoover just last week and of having breakfast with him. I heard him pay great tribute at that time to President Truman. He stated that President Truman had asked him to do these things, and had given him full support and a completely free hand to report the facts as he found them, and that the President had accepted his report in full, and that they were working together, not as Democrat or Republican but as Americans, to meet the obligations of this Nation to all humanity.

I am sure Mr. Hoover will be recognized by the people of the United States, and by the Members of this Congress, as one who, even in the years of his age, has made a great contribution to the welfare of America and of all the world. I wish to compliment the gentleman from California [Mr. ANDERSON], the author of this House joint resolution, for having introduced it.

I hope the rule will be adopted and, in turn, that, as a tribute to a great American, House Joint Resolution 140 will be adopted by this body by a unanimous vote.

Mr. Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio has consumed 15 minutes.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, I yield such time as he may desire to the former Speaker of the House, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. RAYBURN].

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Speaker, I shall take only a minute or two. I am not, of course, going to oppose this resolution. If anyone wants to change the name of this dam to Hoover Dam it is perfectly all right with me. Herbert Hoover has been a great American; I think he still is a great American and is serving his day and generation now in very fine fashion. There is, however, one thing I wish to call to your attention that I think is a great mistake. The name of this dam has been bandied about between Hoover and Boulder, and so on and so forth. I believe it is a mistake to name great public works for living people, for the personality is too close to us. I think it would have been a very bad thing to have built a monument 555 feet tall to George Washington while he was living, and I just want to express the hope that hereafter we not name great public projects for living people.

You will remember they built a dam across Red River between my district and the State of Oklahoma. That river is 1,350 miles long. Someone suggested that they name it the Rayburn Dam. The name "Rayburn Dam" would not have meant anything; certainly it meant nothing to me and it would not have meant anything to anybody else because if somebody had started out to find Rayburn Dam on 1,350 miles of that river they might have a mighty hard time doing it. The dam was finally named "Denison Dam" and it is near Denison, Tex. Everybody knows where it is. After that Oklahoma wanted to get into the picture and they convinced the powers that be that they ought to change the name of the lake above the dam so that Oklahoma would have some part in the name. They changed the name of the lake to Lake Texhoma. It was still Denison Dam, but Lake Texhoma. Now, there is a little town way out in the West named Texhoma. I vision the day when some Nimrod wanting to do some fishing along the banks of beautiful Lake Texhoma with a 1,200-mile shore line, getting ready to throw his line will find himself 200 miles away from the lake.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. KNUTSON].

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Speaker, I am in full accord with the remarks made by my good friend from Texas. I think it would have been a fine thing to have named that dam down there Rayburn Dam, because I know of no man who can dam things up better than the gentleman from Texas when the need arises.

But I cannot help remembering that Norris Dam was named after Senator Norris while he was yet living. As I recall the old gentleman several times capitalized on it, in fact, in his campaigns. Of course, as long as he was running under our banner we did not offer any objection even though he took himself out more often than he put himself in.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. PICKETT].

Mr. PICKETT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed out of order.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

Mr. PICKETT. Mr. Speaker, it is with a mixed feeling of pride and humility I address the House on this occasion.

To those of us whose loyalty to our native soil, the State of Texas, is second only to that to these United States, this, the 6th day of March, is another anniversary among those we humbly note as we reflect on the glories of our State. Ordinarily a discourse of this nature is made on the floor of the House on the day of Texas independence. However, that day fell on Sunday this year.

On this day 111 years ago Col. William Barrett Travis and 187 other determined warriors perished in the cradle of Texas liberty, the Alamo. That tragic episode in our glorious past succeeded by 4 days only the declaration of independence by the intrepid band of patriots who had assembled at Washington on the Brazos a few days before on March 2 and made the second most resounding declaration of its kind ever penned on these shores. That declaration concludes as follows:

We, therefore, the delegates, with plenary powers, of the people of Texas, in solemn convention assembled, appealing to a candid world for the necessities of our condition, do hereby resolve and declare, that our political connection with the Mexican Nation has forever ended, and that the people of Texas, do now constitute a free, sovereign, and independent republic, and are fully invested with all the rights and attributes which properly belong to independent nations; and conscious of the rectitude of our intentions, we fearlessly and confidently commit the issue of the decision to the Supreme Arbiter of the destinies of nations.

Events followed swiftly in the succeeding days and culminated at Buffalo Bayou on April 21, 1836; another date of great significance in the history of our State. Then, Gen. Sam Houston and his army of 783 men attacked and destroyed a Mexican force of twice that number with the loss of only 7 killed and 27 wounded. That victory, encompassing the capture of the Mexican General Santa Anna, was the crowning achievement that resulted in Texas independence.

We, from Texas, whose pride of heritage is so often mistaken for provincialism, call you to witness that those undaunted pioneers: Austin, Bowie, Travis, Fannin, Houston, Rusk, Bonham, Milam, Lamar, Crockett, and the host of their fellows were from all sections of what was then the United States. Scarce among them was a native-born son. They were Americans whose hardy spirits had decreed they migrate to what was then a wilderness for reasons best known to themselves. It was their individuality as Americans that, once banded together in what they deemed a righteous cause, brought forth on this continent another Republic and which since was welded by common consent into an association of States by its treaty of annexation to aid in forming the greatest nation ever to have existed on the face of the globe.

Since becoming a part of this great Nation a spirit of amity and friendship has been conceived and nurtured between the two great republics of North America, the United States and Mexico. The wounds of old have healed and the good-neighbor policy has been substituted. Evidences of these things are countless and the just-concluded visit of President Truman to our neighbor on the south bears witness to the community of ideals enjoyed by the two nations in which we of Texas also take great pride.

Thus, on this day in which we commemorate the fall of the Alamo, we direct to your attention that our seeming provincialism is but the result of pride in our American heritage and the part we have been permitted to play in the development of this great Nation and its relationships with other countries.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PICKETT. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, we on this side of the aisle join with the gentleman from Texas in commemorating the anniversary of Texas and wish for him and the State of Texas a long and very fine life in the Union of States.

Mr. PICKETT. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I yield such time as he may desire to the gentleman from New York [Mr. REED].

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. REED of New York asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD and include an article.

RESTORING THE NAME OF HOOVER DAM

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I yield 4 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. HERTER], who, by the way, served for many years as secretary to Mr. Hoover.

Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HERTER. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. I have asked the gentleman to yield to inform the Members of the House that the Supreme Court has just handed down a decision affirming the conviction of John L. Lewis and, I believe, reducing the fine to $750,000.

Mr. HERTER. Mr. Speaker, I cannot let this occasion go by without saying a word about a man who was my boss, my chief, for a period of 5 years; 5 years during which he spent a considerable portion of his time and energy toward working out the many very complicated problems that arose in connection with the construction of the dam whose name we plan to change today. He was not only Secretary of Commerce at that time but he was also Chairman of the Colorado River Commission, which commission had to determine in conjunction with an interstate treaty among six States how the waters of the Colorado River would be divided in future years. The negotiations were presided over by Mr. Hoover. They were carried on for a good many months, and I believe that if it had not been for the amazing skill, the great patience, yet greater persistence with which he insisted that agreement be reached among the six sovereign States, that dam could never have been built.

I agree entirely with the statement made by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. RAYBURN] that we ought not to name monuments to living people, or, at least, that we should go very slowly in naming monuments to living people, but in this case the facts do not coincide with any such conclusion.

The particular dam to which we are having reference today was named Hoover Dam. It was officially Hoover Dam for a period of 6 years. Then suddenly, and without warning, its name was changed. I am not going to bring in partisan, political matters into this discussion, but I know of nothing more humiliating to an individual than to have had that change take place without debate and without notice. Mr. Hoover is still alive. It is very seldom that we have an opportunity of doing justice to a man and to his memory while he is still alive. I believe that today we have the opportunity of righting what was to my mind a great injustice and at the same time paying a well deserved tribute to one of the greatest of American statesmen.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. I simply wish to say that I am very happy to see the Committee on Rules reporting this resolution and bringing this bill out. During the Seventy-ninth Congress I prepared a resolution on this same subject at the outgrowth of a colloquy on the floor, January 22, 1946, with the gentleman from Arizona [Mr. MURDOCK] over a small bill to amend the Boulder Canyon Act. I was advised at that time, however, that it might be difficult to obtain passage, and on the advice of several friends did not press it for passage at the time. But the correspondence which I received voluntarily and unsolicited from various parts of the country indicated to me how well the country as a whole will receive the passage of this resolution today.

Among the letters I received after it was reported I was preparing such a bill, was one from Dr. Ray Lyman Wilbur, under date of January 28, 1946, in which he said:

> I am herewith sending you some material which may give you some helpful information. I had thought perhaps we might have to wait * * * to clear up this injustice. If I can supply any further information at any time please let me know. I call your particular attention to the opinion of Attorney General Homer S. Cummings.

Subsequently it appeared that nothing could be accomplished in the Seventy-ninth Congress and I so advised Dr. Wilbur, among others, in thanking him for the information he had sent. Thereupon Dr. Wilbur, under date of February 25, wrote me:

> Thank you for your letter of February 16, about restoring the name of Hoover Dam. I think you are quite right that a more favorable time for the introduction of legislation will appear somewhat later. If there is anything that I can do at any time please call on me.

This is that more favorable time, and I compliment the gentleman from California for presenting the legislation and the Committee on Rules for bringing it before us. Its passage is a fitting recognition of recent services performed by a great man who continues to serve his country in a noble way whenever called upon.

Mr. HERTER. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. RANKIN].

Mr. HERTER. Mr. Speaker, I yield the gentleman from Mississippi two additional minutes.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, I do not agree with the gentleman from Texas [Mr. RAYBURN] that we should wait until Mr. Hoover dies to pay him this compliment, and I am not in favor of waiting until the gentleman from Texas dies to name Denison Dam the Rayburn Dam. I have taken that position before.

I remember when this battle was on to develop Boulder Dam. There was a great conflict. I was in favor of an authority; I think yet we should have had an authority. I can never forget the great fight waged by Senator Hiram Johnson, a great Senator and a great American, and by Representative Phil Swing.

But let me show you what Hoover Dam means to the West. Now, it was called Hoover Dam in the beginning, just as Wilson Dam was named Wilson Dam long before Mr. Wilson died, and my recollection is that Roosevelt Dam was named before Theodore Roosevelt died.

Counties all over the country were named after living human beings. There is a county in my State named after a former Member of Congress of my name, Christopher Rankin. My recollection is that Rankin County was named while Christopher Rankin was still alive.

Norris Dam was named after Senator Norris while Senator Norris was still in the Senate.

When Queen Elizabeth was dying she is said to have kept repeating that Latin expression, Mortua sed non sepulta—dead but not buried.

Someone has said that maybe we are just paying a political debt. Many politicians, many Members of the House and of the Senate, and many governors of States who have contributed to the development of their States and their areas have gone out of office and have had projects named for them while they were still living physically. I can see no objection to it.

Mr. COLE of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RANKIN. I yield to the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. COLE of Missouri. May I call the attention of the gentleman to the fact that a dam in Texas has been named for our beloved and very able former chairman of the House Committee on Rivers and Harbors [Mr. MANSFIELD].

Mr. RANKIN. Yes; and I was in favor of that.

Let me say a word about this dam and about Herbert Hoover. Herbert Hoover is an honest man. I know Mr. Hoover. I knew him when he was Secretary of Commerce. I knew him when he was President, and I have watched his career since that time. He is America's No. 1 private citizen today. His Americanism cannot be questioned.

Let us see what Boulder Dam means. Look at Great Britain today, struggling in the throes of a crisis that threatens to last for years. I saw in the paper this morning that they would have to ration electricity for their homes probably for years to come. The power generated at Boulder Dam alone exceeds the combined physical strength of every man in the United States living west of the Mississippi River. It is one of the greatest contributions to that great western country, and especially that section of it that is without gas, coal, and oil. I remember the struggle he waged here to get this dam constructed. When they named it Hoover Dam we discussed it here, and I said, I thought it ought to be named Hoover Dam, and I was disappointed when by an Executive order, or a bureaucratic order, the name was changed. I am in favor of adopting this resolution and restoring to this dam the name of Hoover Dam.

Mr. BARRETT. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RANKIN. I yield to the gentleman from Wyoming.

Mr. BARRETT. There should be no partisanship in this matter. When Secretary of the Interior Wilbur issued the order designating this project as Hoover Dam, the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, the Honorable Edward Taylor, from the great State of Colorado, a Democrat, said on the floor of this House that it was peculiarly proper to name it Hoover Dam, and in his extended remarks he stated that he was happy that the Committee on Appropriations had accepted the designation of the name Hoover for this dam; and the committee repeatedly thereafter brought in appropriations under the designation of Hoover Dam. So there is no partisanship in this question. We are here today correcting a situation. It is not only right and proper but eminently fair.

Mr. RANKIN. There is certainly no politics in it as far as I am concerned. I think Mr. Hoover will understand that it is not a political matter with me.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RANKIN. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. The gentleman from Mississippi has said how important this dam is to the West. I should like to have the gentleman know that California water users and California water districts are committed by binding contracts to pay for the entire dam and all the interest on the money.

Mr. RANKIN. Certainly. As I pointed out the other day, we have 230,000,000,000 kilowatts of electricity, hydro-power, going to waste in our navigable streams and their tributaries every year. For my part, I am in favor of developing all of it, because we are going to need it in the years to come.

But while Mr. Hoover is still alive, carrying on as best he can as a great American, I am in favor of restoring his name to this dam to let him understand that we as Democrats and Republicans, we as Americans, are grateful to him for the service he has rendered.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Mississippi has expired.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, I had the honor of having known former President Hoover long before any of the Members present and long before he was appointed by President Wilson to perform that great humane food mission. I had occasion to visit his offices in San Francisco and see his associate, Mr. Charles Hadsell, who was my attorney then in certain reclamation actions. Of course, I cooperated with him after the First World War when he advocated aid for the starving people of Russia. At that time there was opposition to the proposition, but on the basis of his plea and his report we passed favorably upon his recommendations. I think we even increased the amount, if I remember correctly, from $10,000,000 to $20,000,000. At that time I pointed out that the amount we would appropriate for that purpose would come back to us manyfold. Lo and behold, this resulted in a short space of time to the benefit of our farmers who received at least 25 percent to 30 percent more for their wheat and corn and other products which were used to help feed the starving people of Russia.

Mr. Hoover has been honored twice, once by President Wilson before he himself became President, and again when he was called upon by President Truman to make a needed survey in Europe. I know that he has performed his duties well. Unfortunately, however, as a President, he did not please the American people. But I have always maintained that it was not his fault, but the fault of his party since he was carrying out the policy of his party. Under the policy of the Republican Party there was brought about a condition which he inherited and which he could not very well adjust. Unfortunately, as a result of that policy our country suffered the greatest crisis in its history. So, the then criticism and condemnation of his party was borne by him.

As to changing the name of this dam, I not only have no objection but I think it is fair in view of the fact that the dam was started when Mr. Hoover was Secretary of Commerce. This dam, the construction of which I supported, has proved to be a blessing to hundreds of thousands of our people. I do not oppose the resolution; in fact, I am going to vote for it. In conclusion, I feel that we should not inject politics into matters of this kind. Some of my friends have asked, "How can you justify your vote to change the name of this dam from Boulder Dam to Hoover Dam?" They say it is a political gesture on the part of the Republicans. I said, "I feel they do and are guilty of many things which they think might help them. But in this instance I do not think that was really intended on their part, although they never overlook anything that may help them in that direction. The people are commencing to realize they made a mistake in the last election and they are going to rectify it the same as we are going to rectify and change the name of this dam."

Mr. KEFAUVER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SABATH. I yield.

Mr. KEFAUVER. I think it is entirely fitting and proper to name this dam after a great American who is continuing to give vigorously of his time, intellect, and ability to the American people. I certainly hope all of the Members on this side follow the lead of the distinguished gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH] and that there will not be a dissenting vote to this resolution.

Mr. SABATH. I will say to the gentleman that I appreciate his remarks. I always tried to be fair.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN].

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, I yield the gentleman from Illinois two additional minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN] is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Speaker, ever so often there is a gracious destiny that manifests itself that somehow revitalizes one's faith in the processes of history.

It was in September 1930 that Ray Lyman Wilbur, who was Secretary of the Interior, authorized the use of the name Hoover Dam. It was in that same year, in the month of December, that a great Democrat, who later became chairman of the House Appropriations Committee, and under whom I had the honor to serve, introduced the joint resolution officially naming it Hoover Dam as a fitting tribute to a great President and a great public servant.

It was in May 1933 when the administration changed and a new Secretary of the Interior came along that word went out to the Reclamation Commissioner that the name Boulder Dam or Boulder Canyon Dam should be used. The action that Congress takes—and it is a gracious action, indeed, and far more important than readily meets the eye—reminds me of a story that I encountered a long time ago.

It is the story of the Emperor Justinian who had planned a great mosque to the glory of his own God. He wanted it to be his work and carefully supervised and directed the assembling of the materials and the construction of this edifice. When completed there was to be a great dedication to which people were to be summoned for miles and miles around. It was planned that the cornerstone should bear the name of Justinian and an unveiling ceremony was arranged.

After years of long and arduous labor the structure was completed and the day for unveiling came. Justinian was in all his glory but when the drapes were snatched away ostensively to reveal his name he found instead the name of St. Sophia.

Here was an outrage against the dignity and glory of the Emperor and forthwith he ordered that the Empire be scoured to find the perpetrator of this misdeed. At long last they brought into his presence an aged and bedraggled washerwoman as the person who had committed this act. Justinian could scarcely believe his eyes. He fairly shouted at her in his anger and asked, "Are you the perpetrator of this outrage?" In humility she responded, "Yes, sir; as the laboring horses hauled the heavy stone to the site of this edifice I took off the straw in my pallet and held it out to them in the hope that I might have a small part in the building of this mosque."

It is recorded that for this deed the angels came from heaven and erased the name Justinian and substituted the name St. Sophia.

Today the Congress becomes a gracious angel to erase one name and to substitute another—the name of a man who has given of his energy, his talent, his substance, and his riches for the benefit of mankind. He is a humanitarian who clearly deserves the title not only from our people but from people in all the corners of the world. How fitting then that Congress should this day restore his name to a structure which in the language of our old friend, Chairman Taylor, of Colorado, will make him remembered so long as human beings inhabit this planet.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, I have no further requests for time on this side. I therefore yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I yield the balance of my time to the gentleman from Indiana, the majority leader [Mr. HALLECK].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana is recognized for 4 minutes.

Mr. HALLECK. Mr. Speaker, I do not know that there is anything I can personally add to what has already been said with respect to the historic facts that give rise to this bill. The distinguished gentleman from California [Mr. ANDERSON], the author of the particular bill before us, and the distinguished gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. FOOTE], the author of a similar bill, have individually made exhaustive studies of the origin and history of the Boulder Canyon project, as well as all the facts with respect to the naming and renaming of the Hoover Dam. And, likewise, the distinguished gentleman from California [Mr. PHILLIPS] and the distinguished gentleman from Iowa [Mr. JENSEN], both of whom testified before the Committee on Public Lands in behalf of this legislation, have made a careful examination of the record in the case.

Each of these gentlemen is able to give you every historic detail, and I should like to commend each of them on the thorough, painstaking, truly objective manner in which they have gone into this subject. Perhaps it is significant, Mr. Chairman, that they represent the far West, the Midwest, and the East. They thus evidence, if you will, that across the entire United States there is sincere desire on the part of the fine people of this great country that such legislation as this be enacted to correct a grave injustice done a truly great man.

We do not propose by this bill to rename what is now called Boulder Dam. On the contrary, Mr. Speaker, we simply propose by this bill that it be given its rightful name—the Hoover Dam. By the enactment of this bill we will be restoring a deserved honor to a man who, probably more than any other, contributed to this great engineering project and made it possible.

In 1921 Congress authorized the negotiation of an interstate compact, looking to the construction of this dam, for the purpose of apportioning the waters of the Colorado River system between the upper and lower basin. At that time Herbert Hoover was Secretary of Commerce and was recognized as one of the most outstanding engineers of the world. He was designated as the representative of the Federal Government in the negotiations of the seven States involved in the contemplated compact. Thanks to his technical ability and confidence in his fairness, under his leadership, the Colorado River compact was drafted, ratified by all the States except Arizona, and on December 21, 1928, President Coolidge signed the bill for the construction of the dam in Boulder Canyon or Black Canyon.

In the following March of 1929 Herbert Hoover became President of the United States. He assumed the leadership in bringing this project to completion. On July 3, 1930, he signed the first appropriation bill to enable the construction of the dam to proceed.

And so, Mr. Speaker, while many people had a part in bringing this project into being, as is always true in every such project, President Hoover played a conspicuous part. This was not simply a case of naming a project after a prominent individual who had little or nothing to do with the project itself. This was not simply a case of naming a dam after a President of the United States merely because he was President. This, Mr. Speaker, is a case where a project was named after a President of the United States who made it possible and who, even before he became President, contributed immeasurably to its successful fruition.

On May 27, 1929, one of the most beloved Members of this House, Congressman Ed Taylor, Democrat, of Colorado, introduced House Joint Resolution 81 to name the project the Hoover Dam, "in appreciation of his distinguished services as the official representative of our Government in the negotiation of the Colorado River compact, in recognition of his preeminent ability and international reputation as one of the world's greatest engineers, and as a fitting tribute to our President."

On the suggestion of the then Secretary of the Interior, Ray Lyman Wilbur, Congress took no action on this and other like resolutions. Secretary Wilbur pointed out that Congress had not yet made the appropriation for the proposed dam and that it would be advisable to defer naming it until its construction had been assured. Moreover, a special act of Congress was not necessary to name the dam, in that under the reclamation law the Secretary of the Interior had such authority.

Accordingly, on September 17, 1930, following the enactment of the first appropriation act, Secretary Wilbur issued an order designating the project the Hoover Dam. This was in accordance with many precedents. The Roosevelt Dam in Arizona, the Elephant Butte Dam in New Mexico, the Shoshone Dam in Wyoming, and the Ashurst-Hayden Dam in Arizona had all been named initially by the Secretary of the Interior.

When Secretary of the Interior Wilbur named the Hoover Dam he had clear legal authority to do so, supported by many precedents, and in so doing he was giving recognition to contributions made by the then President which dated back to the days before he became President.

In addition, Mr. Speaker, Congress itself approved the name selected by the Secretary of the Interior. In December of 1930 when the Interior Department appropriation bill was before the House, Congressman Ed Taylor, the distinguished Democrat from Colorado, called special attention to the fact that the bill specifically referred to the Hoover Dam. He said:

> This is the first time that name has appeared in any bill or official act of Congress. This Interior Department appropriations committee thought that following the precedents of the naming of the Roosevelt Dam during President Roosevelt's administration, and the Wilson Dam during President Wilson's administration, and the Coolidge Dam during his administration, that President Hoover was very justly entitled to the same distinction, so we unanimously and very gladly wrote into this action those words making the naming of that great dam the Hoover Dam by action of Congress.

The House and Senate concurred in the views expressed by Congressman Taylor. Thus by the act of February 14, 1931, the Congress confirmed the name Hoover Dam. And in the next four succeeding appropriation acts, all of which are cited in the bill before us, Congress referred to the structure as the Hoover Dam. It is worthy of note, and to the great credit of my distinguished friends on the other side of the aisle, that the last of these acts was passed after Mr. Hoover was defeated for reelection to the Presidency and the last four of these acts were passed when my distinguished friends on the other side of the aisle held a majority in this House.

The Democratic Members of Congress rose above partisan considerations. It was not a question whether Mr. Hoover was a Republican or a Democrat. It was not a question whether you agreed or disagreed with his policies. The fact was that he contributed more than any other man to the project. You believed recognition should be given his great work by having his name attached to the outstanding engineering feat he made possible.

Why is it then that, notwithstanding the fact that the designation Hoover Dam was officially made by the Secretary of the Interior Wilbur, pursuant to his clear legal authority under the reclamation laws and established precedents, that notwithstanding the fact that Congress itself on five specific occasions officially confirmed the name, it is necessary for us to take the action proposed by this bill?

Mr. Speaker, we take this action to correct an injustice done not by a Congress or a party, but by an individual. In 1933 when the Bureau of Reclamation prepared a descriptive pamphlet of the dam for distribution at the Chicago Century of Progress where a model was to be displayed, the then Secretary of Interior Harold L. Ickes sent the proof back to the Commissioner stating that he wanted the dam referred to as "Boulder Dam." He took no official action to change it. He issued no order. He simply told his subordinate that hereafter he was to use the name "Boulder Dam" in referring to the project. And he subsequently complained to the Attorney General, Homer Cummings, that in the pleadings in the case of the United States of America against the State of Arizona the references were to Hoover Dam rather than Boulder Dam. The Attorney General replied that he was not aware that any official action to change the name had been taken, and called attention to the fact that the acts of Congress refer to it as "Hoover Dam" and the contract between the United States and the metropolitan water district referred to it as Hoover Dam. And to this day, insofar as any official departmental action is concerned, the name of the project is Hoover Dam.

This bill will remove the resultant confusion from the personal actions of Secretary Ickes to have the name changed.

It will make it clear that Congress originally intended that the name shall be Hoover Dam and that the Congress stands by its original intent.

Mr. Speaker, Mr. Hoover is a great and patriotic American. He has ever been willing to serve his country in any capacity his great ability can be used. He holds no bitterness. He does not seek revenge upon those who vilified him. He does not seek glory, public acclaim, or monetary reward. He does not ask that this dam which he made possible be named after him. With that same quiet dignity that he retired from public office, he seeks only to serve the country he loves. When our Democratic President, Mr. Truman, asked him, a former Republican President, to assist in the problem of feeding the devastated countries abroad, Mr. Hoover responded with his characteristic true devotion to country and deep love of humanity.

Mr. Speaker, the Congress of the United States will, by the passage of this bill, demonstrate that it has a deep sense of justice. And I venture to say that the present President of the United States will welcome the opportunity to fix his signature to this legislation. I hope that this bill will pass this House by an overwhelming majority, and for it I ask the wholehearted support of Democrats and Republicans alike.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Indiana has expired. All time has expired.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

EXCISE TAX EXTENSION

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Speaker, I call up the conference report on the bill (H. R. 1030) to continue in effect certain war excise-tax rates, and for other purposes, and ask unanimous consent that the statement of the managers on the part of the House be read in lieu of the report.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Minnesota?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the statement.

The conference report and statement are as follows:

CONFERENCE REPORT

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 1030) to continue in effect certain war excise tax rates, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference, have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

Amendment numbered 1: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 1, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed to be inserted by the Senate amendment insert the following:

"SEC. 7. (a) Section 2401 of the Internal Revenue Code (relating to the tax on furs) is hereby amended by inserting after the words 'chief value' a comma and the following: 'but only if such value is more than three times the value of the next most valuable component material'.

"(b) The amendment made by subsection (a) shall apply in the case of articles sold on or after the first day of the first month which begins more than twenty days after the date of the enactment of this Act."

And the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 2: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 2, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed to be inserted by the Senate amendment insert the following:

"SEC. 8. (a) Section 3469 (a) of the Internal Revenue Code (relating to the tax on transportation of persons) is hereby amended by inserting after the first sentence two new sentences to read as follows: 'The tax shall not apply with respect to transportation any part of which is outside the northern portion of the Western Hemisphere, except with respect to any part of such transportation which is from any port or station within the United States, Canada, or Mexico to any other port or station within the United States, Canada, or Mexico. For the purposes of this section, the words "northern portion of the Western Hemisphere" mean the area lying west of the thirtieth meridian west of Greenwich, east of the International Date Line, and north of the equator, but not including any country of South America.'

"(b) The amendment made by subsection (a) shall apply to amounts paid on or after the first day of the first month which begins more than 20 days after the date of the enactment of this Act for transportation on or after such first day.

"(c) Effective with respect to tickets sold or issued on or after the first day of the first month which begins more than 20 days after the date of the enactment of this Act, section 1806 of the Internal Revenue Code (relating to stamp tax on passage tickets) is hereby repealed."

And the Senate agree to the same.

STATEMENT

The managers on the part of the House at the conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 1030) to continue in effect certain war excise tax rates, and for other purposes, submit the following statement in explanation of the effect of the action agreed upon by the conferees and recommended in the accompanying Conference Report:

Amendment No. 1: Section 2401 of the Internal Revenue Code imposes a tax on the retail sale of "articles made of fur on the hide or pelt, and articles of which such fur is the component material of chief value." The Senate amendment makes the tax apply to "articles made of fur on the hide or pelt, and articles of which such fur is a component material the value of which is greater than three times the value of the component material of chief value without regard to such fur." Under existing law the component material of chief value is the one that exceeds in value at the time of assemblage of the article the value at such time of the next most valuable component material. The only change in existing law and its application made by the Senate amendment is to provide that the component material of chief value is the one which at the time of assemblage of the article is more than three times the value at such time of the next most valuable component material.

The Senate amendment also provides that the amendment with respect to the fur tax shall take effect on the first day of the first month which begins more than 20 days after the date of the enactment of the act.

The House recedes with clerical amendments.

Amendment No. 2: The Senate amendment excludes from the tax on transportation of persons, amounts paid in the United States for transportation without the United States, effective on the date of the enactment of the act.

The House recedes with an amendment which (1) limits the exclusion to transportation any part of which is outside the northern portion of the Western Hemisphere, as more fully described below; (2) makes the amendment applicable with respect to amounts paid on or after the first day of the first month which begins more than 20 days after the date of the enactment of the act for transportation after such first day; and (3) repeals section 1806 of the Internal Revenue Code, which imposes a stamp tax on passage tickets for transportation by water, sold or issued in the United States, such repeal to be effective with respect to tickets sold or issued on or after the first day of the first month which begins more than 20 days after the date of the enactment of the act.

As above stated, the amendment agreed to in conference excludes from the tax amounts paid in the United States for transportation any part of which is outside the northern portion of the Western Hemisphere. However, even in the case of transportation part of which is outside the northern portion of the Western Hemisphere, the tax shall apply to any part of such transportation which is from any port or station within the United States, Canada, or Mexico to any other port or station within the United States, Canada, or Mexico. The term "northern portion of the Western Hemisphere" is defined as the area lying west of the thirtieth meridian west of Greenwich, east of the international date line and north of the Equator, but not including any country of South America. Broadly speaking, the amendment as agreed to in conference exempts from taxation trans-Atlantic and trans-Pacific travel and travel to South America, but keeps within the tax travel in or near North America and Central America and the West Indies.

The following examples illustrate the application of the amendment as agreed to in conference:

Example 1: A purchases a ticket in New York for transportation to Lisbon aboard a vessel or aircraft bound from New York to Lisbon, with a stop at Bermuda. No part of the amount paid by A for his ticket is subject to the tax on transportation of persons.

Example 2: If, in the foregoing example, A decides to disembark at Bermuda and not to continue to Lisbon, A is liable for the tax with respect to the amount paid for transportation to Bermuda and, upon presentation of his ticket for refund, the carrier is required to withhold such tax.

Example 3: B, C, and D purchase tickets in New York for transportation aboard a vessel bound from New York to San Francisco via the Panama Canal, with stops at Trinidad and Venezuela. B's ticket entitles him to transportation to Port of Spain, Trinidad; C's ticket is for Asuncion, Venezuela; and D's ticket is for San Francisco. The amount paid by B is subject to tax, since Trinidad is not a country of South America and is within the northern portion of the Western Hemisphere. The amount paid by C is not subject to tax, since Asuncion is located on the island of Nueva Esparta and is included within Venezuela, a country of South America. The amount paid by D is not subject to tax even though the voyage begins at a port within the United States and ends at another port within the United States, since part of the transportation was to Venezuela, a country of South America.

Example 4: E purchases in Chicago a round-trip ticket for transportation by air from Chicago to New York to Newfoundland to London. The amount paid for that part of the transportation between Chicago and New York on both going and return trips is subject to tax. If because of weather or other emergency the aircraft is forced, while on the New York-Newfoundland leg of the journey, to land at Boston, no tax is imposed by reason of such emergency stop.

Example 5: F purchases a ticket in Detroit for transportation from Ottawa to Vancouver to Honolulu to Shanghai. Only the amount paid for transportation from Ottawa to Honolulu is subject to the tax.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. COLE of Missouri asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include a letter and other factual information he received from Mr. Don Houseworth, city editor of the St. Joseph Gazette, regarding the maladministration of OPA at St. Joseph, Mo.

FURTHER PROGRAM FOR NEXT WEEK

Mr. HALLECK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Indiana?

There was no objection.

Mr. HALLECK. Mr. Speaker, a short time ago I announced the program for next week. Since that time I have learned that the Committee on Ways and Means is planning to report out a bill dealing with the matter of the import excise tax of 4 cents per pound on copper, which I understand is a matter of considerable urgency. If that bill is reported and a rule is granted thereon we hope to call it up for consideration next week.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. SADOWSKI asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include an article appearing in the Christian Science Monitor.

RESTORING NAME OF HOOVER DAM

Mr. WELCH. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the consideration of the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 140) to restore the name of Hoover Dam.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the consideration of House Joint Resolution 140, with Mr. HERTER in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the joint resolution.

By unanimous consent, the first reading of the joint resolution was dispensed with.

Mr. WELCH. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 5 minutes.

Mr. Chairman, House Joint Resolution 140 simply restores the name given to the great dam built in the Black Canyon of Nevada that was given to it at the time of its completion.

I visited the site of this great dam before the ground breaking. To reach it I went through the Black Canyon, and indeed it was black. It is more than 30 miles distant from the Boulder Canyon, and to have changed its name from Hoover Dam to Boulder Dam was, in the least, an error with relationship to the topography of the country.

To restore the name of Hoover Dam by affirmative congressional action will put at rest for all time confusion that has been continuously existing from the time the dam was first built down to the present, and it will give some small recognition to the only living ex-President of the United States, under whose administration as President the dam was dedicated. It must always be borne in mind that he has given freely of his time and his talent to serve his country and the world at large. It should be remembered that he responded to a request of his President, your President, and my President of the United States to give of his time and his valuable experience commencing with the First World War when he served under President Wilson to bring relief to the stricken people of the world. Again under the present administration, and regardless of his own convenience and well-being, he is serving in a similar capacity.

I have read Mr. Hoover's statements made through the press since his return from Europe, but in statements which were made off the record which it was my privilege to hear, he explained the problems he faced much more eloquently than anything I can hope to say.

The matter of the restoration of the name of the dam to that of the only living ex-President, and a great American, could and should have been taken up and passed by this House by unanimous consent.

Mr. SOMERS. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Arizona [Mr. MURDOCK].

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Chairman, while I want to honor Mr. Hoover now as one of the greatest living Americans, I cannot enthuse over this measure before us. I do not want to be misunderstood in my action and my attitude toward this resolution. If I vote for it, I might seem to approve all of Mr. Hoover's relation to this total development, and thus I shall displease many of the people in Arizona, for a reason which I hope to explain later. If I vote against it, as someone has just said, that vote may be taken as showing a lack of proper respect for this great American in the work he has recently been doing, and is now doing.

Let me explain my position. I want to honor ex-President Hoover today. I feel honor in my heart for him in his present task. I think there is more than one way in which we can express that honor. I am not at all pleased with this particular way of doing it.

Why do we want to honor Mr. Hoover, especially now? He is the only living ex-President; he is an outstanding American; he is the greatest humanitarian of today; he has been properly eulogized; and I cannot add to that, although I would be glad to do so.

As a student at the University of Iowa at Iowa City in 1924 and 1925, I made frequent trips over to the boyhood home of Herbert Hoover some miles east of Iowa City. I know how the people of that community felt toward his home and toward the scene of his childhood, and I have pretty much the same feeling.

I recall, as has been said here so fittingly, that he has served his country in every way in every clime with all of his talents. I recall that he served a starving world after the First World War, and did it in a magnificent fashion. Now, I note that he has, at the request of our President, traveled all over the stricken world, and has come back saying we must save the starving people of the world. That is in keeping with his great heart. He has suggested that several hundred million dollars be appropriated for that purpose. I have proposed to honor this great American by voting for every dollar he has suggested for that purpose.

An adverse vote here today against this bill might be misconstrued as against Mr. Hoover in certain parts of the world. I recognize the possibility of that and want to make very clear that I honor his recent great work and heartily approve it. The best way we can honor Mr. Hoover and let the world know that we stand squarely behind his magnanimous report recently made to the President is to vote the money he has called for to carry out the great program as he has suggested it. That is exactly what I propose to do.

This is not the time nor the place, nor have I the time today if it were fitting, to go back into the dusty past of the last 25 years and point out why my people are so apprehensive about the trend of legal and physical development on the Colorado River. I hope to do that at some future time.

This dam on the Colorado River, the tallest in the world, is the keystone of the physical development and, while strategic, it is not the most important thing after all. The basic law governing the total development in the Colorado River Basin is far more important. Mr. Hoover had a part to play in the writing of such basic law, including the Colorado River treaty, known as the Santa Fe compact, and also subsequent congressional legislation. Because this seven-State treaty—now that it has been emphasized by the physical construction—is more unchanging than the laws of the Medes and Persians, it may be presumed to last a thousand years. If, through improper and unfair interpretation, which is possible, my State shall be adversely affected, the harm will be irreparable. This is a complex but very vital matter to Arizona which I hope eventually to make clear to the Congress and to the Nation.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Arizona has expired.

Mr. WELCH. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may desire to the gentleman from California [Mr. ANDERSON].

Mr. ANDERSON of California. Mr. Chairman, it is apparent from the trend the debate has taken thus far on House Joint Resolution 140 that there is very little I need to say. It is also apparent that this resolution, of which I am proud to be the author, will pass the House of Representatives today with practically no opposition.

We are doing two things today: One, correcting a mistake that was made by Mr. Ickes in 1933, and, two, honoring a great American citizen who is still serving his country with distinction.

There can be no question about the need for the passage of House Joint Resolution 140. Without affirmative congressional action the name of Hoover Dam might be changed again at a later date by some other Secretary of the Interior. I welcome the support of both Republicans and Democrats and I hope there will not be a dissenting voice when the vote on final passage comes this afternoon.

Mr. WELCH. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may desire to the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. ROCKWELL].

Mr. ROCKWELL. Mr. Chairman, there are many reasons why I am interested in and favor the passage of this resolution to restore the name of Hoover Dam to the dam on the Colorado River in Black Canyon. In the first place, it would right a great wrong. Herbert Hoover, more than any other American, was responsible for the events that led up to the authorization and construction of this great dam. It was he, while Secretary of Commerce, who arranged for the meeting of representatives of the seven States in the Colorado River Basin and the agreement on the Santa Fe compact that divided the waters of the Colorado River between the four upper and the three lower basin States. After this agreement was signed, he called meetings in each of the States and persuaded the legislatures of all but Arizona to ratify the compact. During those years—1922 to 1924—I served as Lieutenant Governor of Colorado and was, therefore, the presiding officer of the Colorado Senate when the Santa Fe compact was ratified by that body. The upper basin States could not and would not approve the building of this dam until they had been assured through this compact of their share of the waters of the Colorado.

In the summer of 1930, Secretary of the Interior Ray Lyman Wilbur dedicated the project with appropriate ceremonies at the site, and formally christened the project "Hoover Dam." The precedent of calling structures after living persons had long been established by the naming of Roosevelt Dam in Arizona for President Theodore Roosevelt, the Wilson Dam in Tennessee after President Woodrow Wilson, and the Coolidge Dam in Arizona after President Calvin Coolidge. The name "Hoover Dam" carried through 3 years of Federal appropriation bills and contracts in Congress before it was changed by Secretary of the Interior Ickes.

My precedessor in this office, Congressman Edward T. Taylor, ranking Democrat on the Appropriations Committee, made this statement in the course of the debate on the Interior Department appropriation bill for the fiscal year 1932:

> There is another feature of this section of the bill under consideration that I feel ought not to be passed over in silence.
> I refer to the three words in the second line, "the Hoover Dam."
> Do you realize that those words just read by the Clerk are making history for thousands of years to come?
> This is the first time that name has ever appeared in any bill or official act of Congress. This Interior Department appropriations committee thought that following the precedents of the naming of the Roosevelt Dam during President Roosevelt's administration, and the Wilson Dam during President Wilson's administration, that President Hoover was very justly entitled to the same distinction, so we unanimously and very gladly wrote into this action those words making the naming of that great dam the Hoover Dam by the action of Congress that will be a monument to him for centuries after every other act of his administration, and of this Congress, will have passed into utter oblivion.
> In fact, it will be a tribute to him as long as this planet is inhabited by human beings. This committee hopes and believes his administration and entire life will be preeminently worthy of his honor, and that history will approve this action of Congress. If I may, without impropriety, refer to my own personal sentiment in this matter, I will say that when that act was passed I thought that dam should have been given the name of the President; because it was not, on May 27, 1929, I introduced House Joint Resolution 81, as follows:
> "House Joint Resolution 81
> "Joint resolution naming the Hoover Dam
> "Resolved, etc., That in appreciation of his distinguished services as the official representative of our Government in the negotiation of the Colorado River compact, signed at Santa Fe, N. Mex., November 24, 1922, and in recognition of his preeminent ability and international reputation as one of the world's greatest engineers, and as a fitting tribute to our President, the highest and greatest dam ever built authorized to be constructed on that river by the act of Congress of December 21, 1928, shall be known and designated on the public records as the Hoover Dam."

It has been my privilege as chairman of the Irrigation and Reclamation Committee of the Public Lands Committee, to preside at the hearings on this bill and to assist it to the floor of this House. President Hoover never asked that this dam, or any other structure, be named after him. In this resolution we merely restore his name to the dam for the construction of which he was so largely responsible, as a matter of justice. He is one of the world's great engineers; he is the only living former President of this Republic of ours; he is a fine, patriotic American, and one of the world's greatest humanitarians. Let us give him this recognition while he still lives.

Mr. WELCH. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may desire to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. VORYS].

Mr. VORYS. Mr. Chairman, we members of the House Committee on Foreign Affairs have had occasion in the past few days to realize that former President Hoover is still a very important and very effective public servant. His testimony before our committee on the relief needs of the world and on the best ways for us to help in meeting these needs was a great contribution to clear thinking on this problem. Mr. Hoover realizes that we must contribute to the relief of the war-devastated countries in ways that will not impoverish us to a condition where we ourselves become objects of relief. At the same time, he showed his deep humanitarian feelings, his profound desire to help the needy and to help his country respond in wise compassion and intelligent generosity to the pleas of the needy throughout the world.

Today, in restoring his name to Hoover Dam, we are perpetuating our memories of him as an engineer. The world will never forget his humanitarian efforts in relief, which have extended over three decades, and which are still continuing. He has made possible the relief feeding of more people, over a longer period of time, than any other man on this planet. He has been able to do this because he combined a great heart with a keen mind and, with deep spiritual background and broad human sympathies, applied his engineering genius to the logistics of the battle against starvation. We have seen fuzzy thinking and poor planning result in the waste and diversion of millions of dollars contributed by American taxpayers to be expended in the name of relief. We restore an honor to President Hoover today. We will also honor him and benefit ourselves and the world if we give heed to his wise, compassionate counsel in the field wherein he is so able, experienced, and expert—the relief of mass human suffering.

Mr. WELCH. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. JENKINS].

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, I shall support this legislation with great pride. I find in the life of Herbert Hoover two instances particularly which reflect very favorably upon this great citizen. In fact, it reflects favorably on the American citizenship generally. I remember very well the inauguration ceremonies for Mr. Roosevelt on the steps of the Capitol. Mr. and Mrs. Hoover were there. We had just come through a terrific campaign. There were perhaps 150,000 people in front of the Capitol. Even though the people had rejected Mr. Hoover in the election, the acclaim for him on that day was wonderful as he made his final appearance as President of the United States. Immediately after that wonderful acclaim and great cheering for Mr. Hoover, as soon as Mr. Roosevelt stepped before the people they did the same for him. I thought that was a great compliment to the American people. They realized the situation. They had exercised their franchise at the election. They had made a decision. There were the two great men—one passing into political oblivion, as it were, and the other starting the upward climb.

Another incident in the life of Mr. Hoover greatly impressed me. It was just a few months ago and during the recent serious situations that developed in our food situation. It was then that the President of the United States, Mr. Truman, who was driven to desperation in trying to solve the problem of what was the best thing to do to feed the people of the world, called on Mr. Hoover, who up to that time had not been given very much consideration by the preceding incumbent. That is another instance where the magnanimity and fairness of the American people was reflected by the action of Mr. Truman. He needed the assistance of the most capable person in the country. He asked the former President to help him and the former President responded without any hesitation. This was Americanism at its best. I was very much impressed with the remark made by my distinguished friend from Arizona [Mr. MURDOCK] when he referred to the home life of Herbert Hoover. I was at his old home in Iowa in the summer of 1928. I was a member of the committee of notification of the Republican convention, whose mission was to notify the Presidential nominee of the Republican Party. Mr. Hoover chose to have this notification ceremony held at his childhood home. He told us there a story and I should like to have time to tell that story. We were in the house where he was brought up as a child. He told us the story, which probably has not been repeated very much. In that campaign he was a candidate against Al Smith. I think they were two as deserving Americans as we have had in modern times; they both had humble beginnings, almost as humble as that of Abraham Lincoln. For instance, take the life of Al Smith, a boy off the sidewalks of New York, and Herbert Hoover, a country boy brought up in the Midwest, left an orphan at an early age.

He told us that before his father was a mechanic, maybe a blacksmith. He showed us where his father operated and the little house in which they lived. There were three children left, a boy and two little girls, all of them small. The mother was a Quaker. She acted as a teacher in that community and kept the little family together until she died. She died when Mr. Hoover was about 8 years old, I think. He told this story in compliment to his own people. He said, in effect, "Our relations came from all over the country, our father's brothers and sisters and our mother's brothers and sisters." After the funeral they came back to the house and they put us three children in a back room while they talked about what they would do with us. I think he said they could hear through the keyhole or the crack in the door what they were talking about. Something had to be done with the children. He said, "To the everlasting compliment of my own people, they were ready to assume the responsibility." He thought because he was a boy none of them would want him; that they would put him aside and take the little girls. He said early in the discussions one of the men spoke up and, in effect, said, "I know most of you folks would prefer to have the little girls, but I want to do my part and I want to take charge of the little boy. I will take that responsibility gladly." Mr. Hoover was proud of that fact, that someone volunteered immediately in the group to take charge of him, because they thought he would be the greatest care. He said the next day he started out with his hand in the hand of his uncle. The sisters went with some of the other relatives. He went into the great Northwest, into Oregon or into one of the Northwestern States, with his uncle who was a lumberman. From that location he, like many other American boys, worked his way down to one of the great universities of California and graduated from there as an engineer. And then the world got him as a world citizen. A great beginning for Al Smith and a great beginning for Mr. Hoover, and a great end for both of them who were candidates for the Presidency in that campaign. Truly America is the land of the free and the brave. It is the land of opportunity.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. JENKINS] has expired.

Mr. SOMERS. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from New Mexico [Mr. FERNANDEZ].

Mr. FERNANDEZ. Mr. Chairman, I am not going to take much of the time of the Committee. This House has more important things to do than to spend time on this resolution. It is evident here today that the members of my party as such are not going to take issue with the majority party on this resolution. They love their country and they place the welfare of their country above partisan politics. Hoover is a great man, as our great former Speaker well said, and I should agree with him. If he is as great in character as our own SAM RAYBURN, who under similar circumstances refused to have a dam named after him, in line with his settled belief that dams should not be named after living men, then I say he would not want it. If we are going to continue to name dams after living men that is one thing, but I believe that Mr. Hoover himself agrees with SAM RAYBURN, because while he was still President a resolution was introduced to name this dam the Hoover Dam and it was never passed, undoubtedly because he dissuaded the members of his party from pursuing the matter further. If we are going to name the dam now officially by action of the Congress there should be no objection to attaching the name "Hoover" to Boulder Dam. No matter what we call this dam officially, it will still be Boulder Dam to all of us from the West. History books show it as Boulder Dam. Literature has been scattered all over the country, and in fact all over the world, calling it Boulder Dam. It will be known as Boulder Dam regardless of what we do here today. Even the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. RANKIN] a while ago could not help calling it Boulder Dam. He finally corrected himself and called it Hoover Dam, in line with his contention that that is its real name. In reading the debates at the time the project was before Congress, I find it was called the Boulder Canyon project. The act itself is named Boulder Canyon Project Act and throughout the years it has been called unofficially Boulder Dam. It is so known. For that reason and because I believe it is the fair thing to do, I offered in the committee an amendment which I would offer on the floor today if I thought the Republican members of the Public Lands Committee after reflection would agree to the amendment and not oppose it.

The amendment I offered would designate it as the "Hoover-Boulder Dam." I believe that will satisfy everybody and at the same time do honor to this great man—and he is a great man. He would have been a far greater man if while he was President he had been able to do the things which would have averted the great depression that followed his administration. He could not do it, not because he was not an able man, but because of the shortsighted policies of his party. If you are going to criticize anybody for that period you should not criticize Hoover so much as his party.

Mr. Chairman, I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. WELCH. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. FOOTE].

Mr. FOOTE. Mr. Chairman, it gives me great pleasure to stand here today and say a few words in support of the adoption of this resolution. I do so not only because I am personally in favor of it but because I know the people of the Third Congressional District of Connecticut are in favor of it; indeed, the people of the State of Connecticut are in favor of it. As a matter of fact, at or about the time the gentleman from California [Mr. ANDERSON] introduced his bill, I introduced a similar one at the request of several constituents living in New Haven. At the time of the hearing before the Public Lands Committee the gentleman from California introduced a substitute bill which I was very glad to accede to.

When I received this request I went over to the Congressional Library and looked up the record. I fully satisfied myself as to the propriety of this action. I do not believe it is necessary for me here today to go into the history of this great engineering project and the circumstances attending the elimination of the name "Hoover" from it, as the matter has been fully covered by those who preceded me. Feeling that possibly I might be in error on this subject, I knew that I had back in my district in the city of New Haven a man who had been very close to this entire situation.

In the time when this project was considered—yes, even when Mr. Hoover was President—there was as majority leader of this House in 1930–32, as I recall the years, none other than Col. John Q. Tilson, of New Haven, who is known to all the older Members of the House and greatly respected by them. I wrote Colonel Tilson, and I said, "I wish you would let me know how you feel about this matter." I received the following letter from him:

It is gratifying to learn that you are interested and actively cooperating in an effort to restore the rightful name to the great enterprise in the Colorado River. It was during the time of my leadership in the House that this great undertaking was finally agreed upon. Before the matter was finally settled, I made a special trip to Arizona, California, and Nevada in order to see for myself. I even negotiated the rapids at Black Canyon aboard a crude motorboat during a freshet. I returned thoroughly satisfied that the enterprise should be carried through and gave it my support. I felt humiliated at the changing of the name. Not that such a performance would in anywise lessen the stature of the man who more than anyone else was responsible for this great engineering achievement. However, it is high time that the matter be set right again, and I am pleased that you thus early in your service are giving it your support.

Mr. Chairman, those are the words of John Q. Tilson, a Member of this House for some 25 years and for a time its majority leader.

I trust that the House by unanimous action here today will honor our only living ex-President, who is also a great humanitarian and friend of all mankind.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Connecticut has expired.

Mr. SOMERS. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from North Carolina.

Mr. FOLGER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that for part of my time I may speak out of order.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from North Carolina?

There was no objection.

Mr. FOLGER. Mr. Chairman, may I say in the beginning that I expect to vote for the pending resolution. I went over to a meeting of the Committee on Foreign Affairs the other day and heard Mr. Hoover testify with animation and interest on behalf of the undernourished children of the world. That was not surprising to me, because he has answered, I think, every request that has been made of him since he was President, and particularly during the war, that he contribute of his intelligence and his industry to the performance of duties that were helpful not only to the American people, but to the peoples of the world.

Mr. Chairman, I asked to speak a little out of order for part of this time, yet it is not too much out of order. I reiterate my appeal to the Appropriations Committee to provide for the carrying on of the school lunch program the rest of this year, not going into next year because that will take care of itself, and consideration can be given in the next general appropriation bill.

This program will go out on the 31st of March and there will be some 2 or 3 months left that the poor children will not be able to get the benefit of these school lunches. Those who are able to pay will get the benefit, the others will have to stand aside and do without.

I hold in my hand a photograph of a lot of school children in my home town partaking of the school lunch. It would have been complete if the photographer could have had the opportunity to take a photograph of the colored children in another school nearby being furnished the same opportunity that those of the white population were furnished. It shows these happy faces, and all of them you look at are happy. They are seated at school lunch tables partaking of a meal that is nourishing, a meal that helps those who may be or are apt to be undernourished. It is a program that we should not let die.

I am going to pin this on the board outside the Chamber here with the request that you look at it and I hope that you Members will appeal to the Appropriations Committee to help us carry on this good work. The program is most worthy, and a necessary provision for the welfare of our children.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from North Carolina has expired.

Mr. WELCH. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may desire to the gentleman from Nevada [Mr. RUSSELL].

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. Chairman, I am in support of this measure, which would restore the name of Hoover Dam to the dam on the Colorado River in Black Canyon, not as a measure political in nature, for there can be no political implications in righting a wrong which was caused through the actions of one man.

You will recall that on September 17, 1930, the Honorable Ray Lyman Wilbur, then Secretary of the Interior, drove the silver spike which inaugurated the actual construction of the project; officially named the dam, "Hoover Dam," and issued an order to the Commissioner of Reclamation so designating it. This action was based on a long line of precedents, and Secretary Wilbur unquestionably had the authority to name the dam, "Hoover Dam." Mr. Hoover had an essential part in making the construction of the dam, so vital to Nevada, possible, and, while Secretary of Commerce in 1922, took part in the formulation of the Colorado River compact, and later as President signed the Boulder Canyon Project Act, which authorized construction of the dam.

Use of the name "Boulder Dam" grew up after Mr. Hoover left office, when the Interior Department avoided the use of the name "Hoover Dam," and substituted the name "Boulder Dam." This action was unwarranted; it was against custom previously adhered to when such other dams had been formally christened, such as Roosevelt Dam, Coolidge Dam, Wilson Dam, and others.

I am pleased that the leadership of both parties have taken the stand they have on this measure, keeping politics out of the consideration of this bill, and considering the measure on its merits, of restoring justice and established practice of honor to Mr. Hoover, who was not only at one time our President, took part in bringing the construction of the dam into actuality, but also in recognition of his great service as a private citizen to his Nation at the call of President Truman.

Mr. Chairman, my State is probably more affected by any name change than any other State, since literature of all kinds which makes reference to the location of the dam, has used the term "Boulder Dam." The dam is one of the most famed attractions in southern Nevada, yet by recognizing the name of the dam again as "Hoover Dam," by which it was officially designated, the dam is not changed, nor its location or attraction. It is still and will remain one of the greatest engineering feats in the West, whose benefits to the West are incalculable.

Mr. SOMERS. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. ELLIOTT].

Mr. ELLIOTT. Mr. Chairman, I am taking this 5 minutes to discuss the resolution before this body. I am very much surprised to learn that there is anybody opposed to honoring our former President, Mr. Hoover, in naming this dam after him, changing it from the present name of Boulder Dam to Hoover Dam. To me, I think this is something that the American people owe from time to time to those who have given so much to our country.

I can remember back when the people of Los Angeles County looked forward to the completion of this great project, and since then every person, in all walks of life, has received great benefits from the construction of this dam. Mr. Hoover is responsible that the undertaking was brought about and completed and put into operation. We should stop and think for a few moments of the great benefits that our Nation received from electric energy in the war we have just won, which was brought about by the construction of this dam. It was due to Herbert Hoover's foresight, and certainly we can pay tribute to him by changing it back to its rightful name as proposed by the gentleman from California [Mr. ANDERSON]. It should have been left as it was named in the first place.

I am not one of those who believe that we should wait until a person dies to have something named for him or given to him. I can remember just a few weeks ago that the Democrats on my right purchased a Cadillac automobile and gave it to our former Speaker, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. RAYBURN]. We did not wait until he passed on and then give him an automobile, to ride in to go to hell or heaven or wherever he was going. We gave it to him now.

I feel that as Americans, if we are going to be Americans, we should honor our people while they are on earth. I have been called practically everything in my lifetime, so I am accustomed to most of the names, but if somebody is going to wait until I die and then name something after me, I am telling them now to just not do that kind of thing, because I do not believe in it. I think we should honor and respect the people who have done great deeds, such as Herbert Hoover has done in his lifetime, so that they can enjoy it and appreciate what the American people think of their work. I have not always agreed with Herbert Hoover's program or what he has stood for, but he is one of our greatest living Americans. The President of the United States, Mr. Truman, has time and again called upon Herbert Hoover to go and do a job. There were plenty of Democrats available if we could have gotten them or if we could have found the right one. At the age of 70, Herbert Hoover time and again has gone out and done a job that would tax the strength of a much younger man.

We should not have a dissenting vote on this resolution when it is voted on today; not a dissenting vote should we have, if we believe in paying great Americans the honor that is due them. I urge that everybody in this House vote for this resolution.

Mr. SOMERS. Mr. Chairman, I yield the balance of the time under my control to my very gallant and illustrious friend and chairman the gentleman from California [Mr. WELCH].

Mr. WELCH. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GROSS].

Mr. GROSS. Mr. Chairman, I was tremendously amazed and somewhat confused at the attitude of the gentleman from Arizona. I remember a year ago an occasion when he brought some constituents before the old Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation. They wanted to have a dam built and name it after some prominent person out there. He very definitely told the committee that he intended to carry that program on in the construction of irrigation and reclamation projects, and he intended to do that in other States. That was to be the policy. It was then that I reminded him not to go so far afield, that I remembered that Boulder Dam was at one time called Hoover Dam.

Today I am very happy at what this House is going to do. I am very happy at the attitude of the rank and file of the gentlemen on the other side of the aisle. Herbert Hoover has always been an ideal of mine. I have followed his career closely and have read about him whenever I could. I love him for what he is and has done. But the building of Hoover Dam and his great humanitarian work for the world have not been his outstanding achievements. In my opinion, the greatest characteristic of his life, that shows his true worth and his true greatness, is that through the years when his character was being assassinated, when he was being belittled and humiliated and besmirched, Herbert Hoover never showed any sign of resentment or bitterness. He went his way doing the work he believed was his to do. If men in public life generally followed that attitude, this whole world would be better today. Herbert Hoover served around the world for many years and never asked for anything, never even took a dollar pay. I hope God will spare him for many years that the world may have his wise counsel.

Mr. WELCH. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BENDER].

Mr. BENDER. Mr. Chairman—

If with pleasure you are viewing
Any work a man is doing,
If you like him or you love him,
Tell him now.

Don't withhold your approbation
'Til the priest makes his oration
And he lies with snowy lilies
On his brow.

For no matter how you shout it.
He'll not know about it,
For he cannot read his tombstone
When he's dead.

Mr. Chairman, I like what some of my Democratic brethren have been saying about the renaming of this dam. I like it because of the fine attitude displayed. They rise above their partisanship and pay tribute to a great man. It is most pleasing for this Congress that we pause at times to pay tribute to great men irrespective of party.

As was pointed out by the gentleman from California [Mr. WELCH], Herbert Hoover has been called upon not only by the citizens and organizations of this country but by the present President of the United States to render the services to humanity for which he is best equipped.

During the time he was President, I understand, Herbert Hoover never accepted a penny of his salary. As a matter of fact, he never accepted compensation for any of his public service. He was not the richest man to occupy the White House. It is true that he is a man of wealth, but in any event he never personally profited 1 cent from any public service that he rendered. He had a summer camp here in Virginia, which I believe was known as Camp Rapidan. He gave that to the United States Government after he retired from the Presidency.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BENDER. I yield gladly.

Mr. RANKIN. No intelligent man has ever accused Herbert Hoover of being tainted with un-Americanism.

Mr. BENDER. The gentleman is 100 percent right.

When Mr. Hoover left the White House he provided a place in Stanford University for his official papers, not at the expense of the taxpayers of the United States, which he paid for out of his own pocket. He is that kind of man. He is not a man who has a flair for publicity or a flair for propaganda about himself. He has never had a staff of publicity agents promoting him. Perhaps he should have had. In any event, we are beginning now to appreciate his great service as President of the United States. I trust we will honor more public servants in this way.

Mr. WELCH. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. PHILLIPS].

Mr. PHILLIPS of California. Mr. Chairman, I am tremendously pleased that the Congress is prepared today to honor a man whom the whole world esteems and respects. On August 2 of last year I put into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD a chronological statement of the events which led up to the changing of the name of this dam. It was my intention upon returning to this session of the Congress to introduce a resolution, such as the one introduced by the gentleman from California [Mr. ANDERSON], upon which we vote today. I believe that was the intention of more than one Member of the House of Representatives. So, today, all of us are pleased to support this resolution, which apparently will pass this House by a very large majority. When we honor Herbert Hoover we honor a man who richly deserves anything which the United States of America may be able to bestow upon him in the way of honor.

Mr. WELCH. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. JOHNSON].

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Mr. Chairman, nothing that I can say will add to what has been said about Mr. Hoover.

As you all know, he is probably the outstanding humanitarian in the whole world. I have always felt that his work along humanitarian lines is a reflection of his experience as a boy when he was well treated by relatives and friends. He also expressed his gratitude to his university, Stanford University. He gave them a great deal of money to build a large memorial library. There in that library is one of the finest collections of books on war and peace in the entire United States.

One thing that I think has not been mentioned today illustrates what a practical man Mr. Hoover is. When this great dam was under consideration and under construction, it was through his business ability and foresight that commitments were made for the purchase of the water from this great river, which would repay the American taxpayer every dollar put into it, plus interest. All of those dollars are coming from California water users and California water districts.

I do not think it is inappropriate at this time, in honoring Mr. Hoover, to mention one or two people, Californians, who had a great deal to do with the development and construction of the great Hoover Dam. I believe the Reclamation Commissioner was Professor Mead, formerly with the University of California, and the lake behind the dam is known as Mead Lake. Two distinguished men in Congress devoted a great many years of tireless effort to bringing about the consummation of this great project. Senator Hiram W. Johnson presented a bill in the Senate and Congressman Phil Swing, who was in this House a great many years, presented a bill in the House. Those two men worked incessantly for years, trying to explain the need for this dam and get the Congress to understand its necessity. They finally succeeded in getting the Congress to understand this project and the project was built. Senator Johnson has gone to the great beyond. Mr. Swing is still alive. He is here frequently. I want the RECORD to show that in honoring Mr. Hoover and correcting an injustice that was done to him in calling Hoover Dam "Boulder Dam" we are also thinking of those two other great Californians, Hiram W. Johnson and Phil Swing, who had such a great part in bringing about the consummation of this great project.

The bill providing for the construction of this great conservation project is called the Swing-Johnson bill, in honor of these two great men. We owe them our undying gratitude for their statesmanship in piloting through Congress this important legislation.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of California. I yield.

Mr. SABATH. I wish to state that I was a Member of Congress during the time Mr. Swing was a Member and I remember the great service rendered and the efforts put forth by him. I know he devoted 2 or 3 years' time and finally succeeded in bringing about the construction of the Boulder Dam, which I am pleased to know will be named Hoover Dam.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. I thank the gentleman for his contribution. I hope there will not be a single dissenting vote on the passage of this resolution. It seems to me, if you want to be fair and just, you will have to vote for this resolution.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from California [Mr. JOHNSON] has expired.

Mr. WELCH. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may desire to the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. CHENOWETH].

Mr. CHENOWETH. Mr. Chairman, I am delighted to see this legislation on the floor. I think it is long past due. No one has ever been able to determine just why the name of this dam was ever changed. We have an opportunity today to rectify a great wrong that was done, and it is to the credit of this House that this measure will be passed without opposition.

We are today recognizing the part that Mr. Hoover played in making this dam possible. It has always been conceded that he was the moving spirit in this stupendous undertaking. It took the skill and technical knowledge of an outstanding engineer like Mr. Hoover to suggest such a project, and it is only fitting that this great dam should bear his name.

It gives me great pleasure today to join with my colleagues in paying tribute to this preeminent American not alone for his part in this enterprise but also for his contribution to society and civilization throughout the world. I introduced him some years ago at a meeting in Colorado as America's foremost citizen, and no one now disputes that he occupies that position.

Mr. WELCH. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. RAMEY].

Mr. RAMEY. Mr. Chairman, let it be understood from the beginning that I intend to give my most hearty support to this measure, so do not misunderstand me in the statement I am about to make.

I have never favored personalizing public improvements. Each toiler who worked there was entitled to the same credit as a builder. I do not believe in personalizing principle or activity. I believe that Mr. Hoover in his humility would be the last person to ask that this great achievement be named for him. However, it was named for him from the beginning. There is no change. He deserves it.

The gentleman from California [Mr. JOHNSON] spoke of two or three others in his remarks. I think one of the outstanding things in Mr. Hoover's administration was his wisdom in the appointment of persons to public positions. I am thinking of his wisdom in the appointment of his Postmaster General, Hon. Walter F. Brown, a man who acted in a political position in the Cabinet without going across the country in order to promote partisan advantage; a man who was on the job as a Cabinet member; a man who had more on the shelf and less on the display counter than any Postmaster General this country has ever had. Postmaster General Walter F. Brown did the work of a cabinet member without making a fuss about it.

Another reason for honoring the man, or any ex-President today is perhaps the fact that so many would-be writers after a President is gone, as the gentleman on the other side of the aisle mentioned, are given to libeling our Presidents. They libel them after they are gone and have no opportunity to defend themselves—George Washington, Abraham Lincoln, Andrew Johnson, Grover Cleveland, Woodrow Wilson, Warren Harding—most of our Presidents have been libeled after they were gone and not here to defend themselves. Their executors cannot sue for libel. The libeler to that extent is immune. I understand Mr. Coolidge was the only ex-President who has not been libeled by these mental sadists.

Mr. BENDER. Will my able colleague yield?

Mr. RAMEY. I yield.

Mr. BENDER. The statement of my good friend the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. RAMEY] is most welcome not only because of the tribute paid to President Hoover but also because of his gracious remarks regarding a great Ohioan, Walter F. Brown. I well remember as a boy my great admiration for Mr. Brown when he was leading the Progressives of 1912 in the Theodore Roosevelt campaign.

Mr. RAMEY. I thank the gentleman for his gracious tribute to the great Ohioan, the great American, that man who has worked so much and talked so seldom, the Honorable Walter F. Brown.

On February 12 at the city of Toledo on the occasion of the Lincoln Day banquet at the Commodore Perry Hotel Walter F. Brown was the guest of honor.

At the request of Hon. Harry N. Hansen he was presented to his home people by Hon. Frank A. Wiley, the presiding judge of the municipal court of Toledo. The demonstration of our citizens not only in standing applause but in their love for this genuine man was the most outstanding we had ever witnessed.

Mr. WELCH. Mr. Chairman, I have no further requests for time.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the name of Hoover Dam is hereby restored to the dam on the Colorado River in Black Canyon constructed under the authority of the Boulder Canyon Project Act, approved December 21, 1928 (45 Stat. 1057), and referred to as Hoover Dam in the act approved February 14, 1931 (46 Stat. 1146); in the act approved April 22, 1932 (47 Stat. 118); in the act approved July 1, 1932 (47 Stat. 535); in the act approved July 21, 1932 (47 Stat. 717); and in the act approved February 17, 1933 (47 Stat. 845). Any law, regulation, document, or record of the United States in which such dam is designated or referred to under the name of Boulder Dam shall be held to refer to such dam under and by the name of Hoover Dam.

The CHAIRMAN. Under the rule, the Committee rises.

Accordingly the Committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. HERTER, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union, reported that that Committee having had under consideration House Joint Resolution 140, to restore the name of Hoover Dam, pursuant to House Resolution 132, he reported the same back to the House.

The SPEAKER. Under the rule, the previous question is ordered.

The resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

FIRST DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL SENT TO CONFERENCE

Mr. TABER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill (H. R. 1968) making appropriations to supply urgent deficiencies in certain appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1947, and for other purposes, with Senate amendments thereto, disagree to the Senate amendments, and agree to the conference asked by the Senate.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none and appoints the following conferees: Messrs. TABER, WIGGLESWORTH, ANGELL, STEFAN, CASE of South Dakota, KEEFE, CANNON, KERR, and MAHON.

THE LATE HON. JOHN J. COCHRAN

Mr. KARSTEN of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri?

There was no objection.

Mr. KARSTEN of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, it is my sad duty to announce the death of John J. Cochran, a former Member of this body. It was my privilege to be associated with him as his secretary for many years. I came to know him as a son would know his father, and his passing is a great personal loss to me.

Crippling illness caused the voluntary retirement of Mr. Cochran in January. He was one of the most outstanding men ever to serve in this House. Measured by any yardstick, he was great. Some men have had great moral courage, some great physical courage, some great hearts, and some great minds. Jack Cochran had all of them. It is not often that a man in public life so conducts himself that even those whose cherished plans or schemes he had to oppose respected and loved him. If Jack Cochran had a real enemy no one ever heard of him. A few years ago, when physical adversity overtook him, Republicans, as well as Democrats, bowed their heads in sorrow. From the White House to the poorest home in his beloved Thirteenth District prayers went up for the restoration of his health. Those prayers were answered. Overcoming perhaps the greatest physical handicaps, he carried on his work here from a wheel chair. In this well he served as an inspiration to everyone with whom he came in contact.

Thousands, through the years, went to him with their problems. Some perhaps belonged to a group with powerful influence, others perhaps important in one way or another, or perhaps it would be the mother of a boy who had not been heard from since he followed the colors into some bomb-racked danger spot in the war. Perhaps it would be a poor colored man or some old woman, doubtful about their rights under the old-age assistance or social-security plan. Perhaps to their neighbors they were just a nobody, but great body or nobody, when they knocked at Jack Cochran's door they did not knock in vain. When they knocked he did not ask whether they lived in his district. He did not ask what ticket they voted or intended to vote. He did not ask their color, creed, or calling. He only asked, "What can I do for you?" That was his philosophy, help thy fellow man.

I know the Members of this House join me in mourning the death of this great statesman and expressing heartfelt sympathy to the members of his family.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, in all the long line of able men who have served in this House from his native State, none has served more conscientiously, courageously, and capably than Jack Cochran. And none has enjoyed to a larger extent the confidence and affectionate regard of his colleagues on this floor.

Few Members of the Congress have exerted so wide an influence or have left their impress so indelibly on national legislation. He had the advantage of a long and privileged apprenticeship under such men as Stone and Hawes and came to the House a veteran in legislative experience and parliamentary procedure. He was early recognized as one of the effective Members of the House and his grasp of public questions, his sound judgment, his high sense of responsibility and his personal popularity soon established him as one of the substantial Members to be consulted when important decisions were to be made.

He had an indefatigable capacity for hard work, a genius for getting things done, and a passion for economy and business efficiency. It would be difficult to estimate the amounts he saved the taxpayers of the Nation in the 22 years of his service here, especially during his chairmanships of the Committee on Accounts and the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments. Unquestionably it would aggregate millions of dollars. No bill to pay a claim against the Government was ever called up in the committee or the House without his personal scrutiny and without being stripped of every dollar not fully warranted by the law and the circumstances.

He never hesitated to say "No." He stood foursquare and voted against both friends and constituents when convinced of the merit of his position. His disinterested devotion to his convictions was never better demonstrated than in his vote on the reapportionment of congressional districts. I remember his saying here on the floor: "No Member of this body could be more vitally affected by reapportionment than I will be. When it becomes effective my service here will terminate." The effect was to throw him into a district with six to eight thousand majority against him. But to the astonishment of the State—and I think of Jack himself—the district, with an overwhelming majority against him, returned him to Congress and continued to return him to Congress until his retirement last December. He could again have been elected to Congress had not his high sense of duty intervened. All that was necessary was for him to announce his candidacy and he would have been returned as a Member of the Eightieth Congress. But feeling that his health would not permit him to devote to the office the energy and labor he thought the position demanded, he declined to become a candidate. In both instances he met the test with an unselfish fortitude that was characteristic of his entire public service.

Jack Cochran was fundamentally a liberal. He sympathized with the underdog. He was a progressive and a Democrat in every sense of the word and was the key figure in many a congressional battle for economic and social reform. I remember hearing him enunciate his political philosophy during his hectic campaign for the United States Senate—in which he came within a few thousands of votes of victory—"the Government is not an end in itself but a means to an end, an instrumentality for achieving social justice. The Government is made for the people—not the people for the Government." Or, as he expressed it a little more tersely in the language of the street, "Help the other fellow. Give the other guy a break." With that mission in life, Jack Cochran spent the vital years of his life doing things for other people. He never wanted anything here in the House, or the party or the organization, for himself. He was always working to get it for his friends. He was a living exemplar and practitioner of the Golden Rule, and I want to here make acknowledgment of countless kindnesses which I have never been able to repay—and which I now can never repay.

When Jack Cochran relinquished his seat in this body he did not relinquish his place in the hearts of his friends. And he can never relinquish his place in the esteem and affection and admiration of his colleagues who have had the privilege of association with him here through these eventful years of his service to his State and his country.

The SPEAKER. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Texas [Mr. RAYBURN].

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Speaker, like all who knew Jack Cochran, I was saddened a few minutes ago when I heard of his passing. I have served in this House, I guess, with 2,000 men and women since I first came here. Jack Cochran was probably the best Congressman I have ever served with. He knew more about more things that came before the House of Representatives than any other man I have ever known, with the possible exception of James R. Mann, of Illinois, who was the minority leader of this House at one time since I came here.

Jack Cochran was a gentle soul; he was a noble, good man; he was one of those who gave love and attracted it from other people. You were not just Jack Cochran's friend. You had a deep devotion for him—those who were associated with him as closely as I was.

With his constituents and those others who knew and loved him, I shall miss him terribly and always.

The SPEAKER. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BAKEWELL].

Mr. BAKEWELL. Mr. Speaker, it is my privilege to serve a district in St. Louis immediately adjoining that of the late beloved John Cochran. I know how he was loved by all of St. Louis. I came to Congress on the same day the late John Cochran retired from the Congress, and, though he was of different political faith than myself, I can honestly state that the highest aspiration I could have in this Congress is in some small way to endeavor to emulate the pattern of true public service which he always rendered.

St. Louis has lost a devoted and beloved son, and the Nation suffers an irreparable loss of a distinguished public servant.

The SPEAKER. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MCCORMACK].

Mr. MCCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, the death of our late beloved friend, John Cochran, grieves each and every one of us who knew him, and particularly those of us who served with him. John Cochran was a true friend. Toward those that he entertained friendship it meant what real friendship stands for: loyalty, and fidelity to his friends.

I agree with our distinguished colleague the gentleman from Texas [Mr. RAYBURN] that John Cochran was the most outstanding Member of Congress that I have served with, and our friend, the gentleman from Texas, has served in this body many more years than have I. Over and above that, he was one of the most courageous men that I have ever met. Those of us who served with him can see him now in the well in his chair, with both of his legs amputated. We know the serious condition he suffered prior to the surgical operation that resulted in the amputation of his limbs. He had a bad heart condition. His life was despaired of for a long period of time. We all know of the indomitable courage of Jack Cochran. Jack Cochran was a religious man. He had that refined, direct contact that each of us understood and appreciated and evaluated in its proper light. But, he was truly a religious man, a man of deep religious convictions, and a man who by every action and expression showed the influence of the deep religious convictions he entertained.

His passing is an irreparable loss, not only to St. Louis and the State of Missouri, but to the Nation as a whole, and especially to those of us who had the privilege of knowing John Cochran. He leaves a memory that will always remain with each and every one of us.

The SPEAKER. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. SUNDSTROM].

Mr. SUNDSTROM. Mr. Speaker, it is with extreme regret that I just learned of the death of our friend and former colleague, the Honorable John J. Cochran. I had the pleasure to serve as the ranking minority member on the Committee on Accounts with Jack Cochran. As chairman of that committee he always showed fairness to the minority. He was a man of integrity and a man who kept his word. Despite all his physical handicaps, he had cheerfulness and abounding energy, and even in later years when he was handicapped he carried on diligently and courageously.

To his family I know I express the views of all of us when I extend our sincere sympathies.

The SPEAKER. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WHITTINGTON].

Mr. WHITTINGTON. Mr. Speaker, for 2 and 20 years I served in this House with Jack Cochran. We both entered the Sixty-ninth Congress. Through the years, he and his wife and Mrs. Whittington and I were close personal friends. For years we served together on the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments. He attended all committee hearings, and he was not satisfied until he mastered all bills reported by the committee. He had had previous experience as a clerk to a distinguished Senator and as a clerk to an able Representative. He was thoroughly familiar with the executive departments of the Government. I never knew a more efficient Member of Congress or a more capable member of a committee. If there is one assignment where Members come to know one another better and where Members can take the true measure of other Members better, it is when they are members of the same committee.

Jack Cochran was jealous of the interests of the district he represented and faithful in promoting the progress of the people who sent him to the House. At the same time he recognized his responsibility to the Nation and was faithful in the discharge of his obligations to the country. He watched the Private and the Consent Calendars, as well as the other calendars of the House. He saved the Federal Treasury millions and millions of dollars. I often called my devoted friend the watchdog of the Federal Treasury.

Jack Cochran possessed all of the qualifications of a faithful public servant. He was industrious. In his latter years he was physically handicapped, but he was still the indefatigable worker that he was when he entered Congress. I have often marveled at both his industry and accomplishments, handicapped physically as he was in his last years. He was not only familiar with legislation pending before the committees on which he served, but he was probably more familiar with general pending legislation than any other Member of the body. I never knew a more industrious man.

Jack Cochran was courageous, but he was fair. He was willing to hear both sides of any question, but he had the courage of his convictions. Once convinced, he was as immovable as the Rock of Gibraltar.

He was a patriot. He was proud of the city of St. Louis and the district that he represented. He was an American first, and he was a patriot always. He knew that his own district could not prosper unless his country prospered. He had the national outlook, and he rendered service to the entire country.

The friendships formed in this body where Members are measured at their true worth, are enduring. Jack Cochran was a true and loyal friend. He knew that the best way to have friends was to be a friend. No man was ever more devoted to his friends than Jack Cochran. Our departed colleague was loyal to every friend and faithful to every trust.

The country needs the services of men like Jack Cochran. The House can ill afford to lose such Members as he. I gladly join in paying deserved tribute to his memory.

The SPEAKER. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BENDER].

Mr. BENDER. Mr. Speaker, when I first came to this House as a Republican Member and saw and heard John Cochran in action I was distressed not a little bit as he was a hard-hitting partisan. I thought he was quite vehement at times.

I also became acquainted with a former Member of this House, Albert Carter, who incidentally has been ill for over a year. Al Carter and Jack Cochran would meet in the lobby, and I never heard two men go after each other as they did. I thought they meant it. I was very much concerned that they would come to blows. Then I discovered the true character of Al Carter and Jack Cochran. They were fine friends. Even though they disagreed violently on issues on the floor of the House they were good friends, and they had a deep and abiding affection for each other. They knew what good friendship meant.

I share the views of those who have spoken before. I believe it is most fitting that today, while we are commenting on another great American, Herbert Hoover, we should pay tribute to a great Democrat, a man who served his district and country well.

I saw Jack Cochran on a number of occasions when he was in the hospital. Jack Cochran lived a strenuous life. As the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WHITTINGTON] said, I never knew a more diligent, painstaking, and conscientious member of the Committee on Expenditures. We will miss him.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members who so desire may extend their remarks at this point in the RECORD on the life and character of John J. Cochran.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

Mr. PRICE of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I am saddened at the announcement just made to the House by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. KARSTEN] of the death of our beloved former colleague, the Honorable John J. Cochran, of St. Louis.

It seems only a short time ago that many of us took the floor to pay tribute to Jack Cochran's long years of tireless service in this body as he announced to his people back home that he would not be a candidate for reelection in November of 1946. We were saddened then at the thought of losing the company of this great man, but we who knew him so well hoped that he would have many years of rest and comfort as a reward for his labors in behalf of his district, city, State, and Nation.

The news today, therefore, brings us much sorrow. We extend to his former constituents our deepest sympathy in their loss of a sincere and courageous champion. I know that in every home in the sections of St. Louis which were fortunate enough to be included in Jack Cochran's district there will be genuine mourning over his passing. There will be tears in the eyes of countless numbers all through the city of St. Louis, because everywhere Jack Cochran was known there was that personal touch that brought him close to every individual.

I represent a district in Illinois across the Mississippi River from our former colleague's constituency—close enough to have been an observer through the years of Jack Cochran's work in Congress and to have observed the high regard in which he was held by the people of St. Louis—Republicans as well as the members of his own Democratic Party. So universally recognized were Jack Cochran's numerous achievements that on many occasions he was left unopposed on election day. There may have been political trends that would have threatened the security in office of other candidates, but in November the trend in North St. Louis was always toward Jack Cochran.

I particularly have always been a staunch admirer of our departed colleague. I have known him personally since March 1933, when I came to Capitol Hill as a secretary. Jack Cochran also first came to Capitol Hill as a secretary. In time he became a Member in his own right, and everyone here—and everyone throughout the length and breadth of this land—knows the splendid record he compiled as a Member.

Those of us who are Members of Congress today after having first served an apprenticeship as a congressional secretary, always looked to Jack Cochran as our patron. When in our freshmen years we encountered difficult problems, Jack Cochran was the man we turned to for advice and counsel. This he freely gave. He set an example in his own conduct of official duties that when followed by others always meant better service to the Nation. His judgment was sound—he was tireless in his efforts and he thought always in terms of what he believed to be best in the Nation's interest.

The best tribute we can pay to Jack Cochran is to pledge to his memory that we as servants of the people will try to be, at all times, the same kind of a Congressman Jack Cochran was during his 22 years in the House of Representatives.

Mr. MANASCO. Mr. Speaker, I was deeply shocked, although not surprised, to learn of the death of our former distinguished colleague, Hon. John J. Cochran, of Missouri.

I had known Mr. Cochran since I came to Washington in 1933. I soon learned that he was one of the hardest workers, if not the hardest worker, in the House of Representatives. I was amazed to watch him on the floor day in and day out as he discussed all kinds of legislation as only an expert could discuss it. I still do not know how he found the time to study and comprehend every bill that was considered by the House while he was a member.

After my election to the House, I served with him on the Committee on Expenditures in Executive Departments until his retirement.

Jack Cochran was severely handicapped by the loss of both legs and an ailing heart during the last few years of his service in the House. Most of us would have stayed away from our committee work under similar circumstances, but not Jack Cochran. He would sit for hours at a time in committee hearings and or conference committees without complaint. He had a keen conception of legislation.

Although he fought with great tenacity for the principles for which he stood, when he saw that he could not gain his point, he was a ready compromiser. He was tolerant of the views of those who opposed his position.

Jack Cochran not only was a statesman in the truest sense of the word, but was also a most able advocate for the rights of his constituency. In all probability he personally handled more complaints for his constituents with executive departments of the Federal Government than any other two Members of the House.

His courage, although he was seriously physically handicapped, will always be an inspiration to me and to those who served with him. Our Nation can ill afford to lose men like Jack Cochran. May his spirit rest in peace.

Mr. ELLIOTT. Mr. Speaker, a few minutes ago my colleague, Mr. FRANK KARSTEN, announced the death of his former boss, Jack Cochran. Many Members of this House, who were formerly associated with him, I know, are saddened to learn of his passing. I was privileged, Mr. Speaker, and honored, to serve on two important committees with Jack Cochran. He had a great knowledge of various important bills which passed the Congress through the years, and he served his country, on the whole, as a great American. Mr. Cochran and I were members of the House Accounts Committee and I well remember the many times he called attention of the membership of the House to the manner money was being spent, unnecessarily, by some of our investigating committees. He was against such expenditures because he was for economy. He talked economy year after year, and was voted down time and time again by both sides of the aisle, when, to my way of thinking, he was right. I considered Jack Cochran my friend. I valued his knowledge and sincerity. This Nation has lost a great legislator and a fine American. My deepest sympathy is extended to his family.

Mr. ZIMMERMAN. Mr. Speaker, the announcement of the death of Hon. John J. Cochran, of Missouri, which occurred about noon today at his home in St. Louis, brings a deep sense of sorrow and sadness to all of us who knew him while a Member of this body.

During the 20 years of service in this body, no district or State had a more industrious, able, faithful, or effective Representative than the district and State which he represented. Mr. Cochran enjoyed the well-earned reputation of being one of the hardest-working, best-informed Members of Congress; and while a hard fighter for the things he believed in, and likewise against the things he believed to be wrong, he at all times enjoyed the confidence and respect of his colleagues, irrespective of which side of the aisle they occupied.

Personally, I keenly feel the loss I have sustained in the passing of our friend. Jack Cochran was never too busy to help or advise a friend. When I became a new Member of this body at the opening of the Seventy-fourth Congress, I soon learned to rely upon the advice and counsel of Mr. Cochran, who was always ready and willing to help a new Member. Our friend was truly a man who loved his fellow man, and he never faltered in his efforts to bring the light of a better day to his fellow man, high or low, rich or poor.

I join with his many friends in extending sympathy to his family and relatives during these sad days and hours, and, in a final salute, "Well done, thou good and faithful servant."

Mr. FORAND. Mr. Speaker, our true friend, Jack Cochran, has answered his last roll call. Announcement of his passing was a shock to many of us, and his death means a great loss to his State and to the Nation.

To those of us who were privileged to know him, he was a friend and counselor. He was most unselfish in his efforts to help all who sought his assistance. He was an indefatigable public servant and yielded to no man in his patriotic devotion to his public duties. He was fearless in espousing causes which he considered just. He would not compromise his principles for political expediency.

Jack Cochran was a real man. He was a God-fearing man, and our Nation is better because he lived.

Mr. JARMAN. Mr. Speaker, few Members have left this body since I became a Member of it who have been as greatly missed as Jack Cochran has. As the gentleman from Texas, Speaker RAYBURN, has just said, few if any Members have ever been his equal during the history of this country. Few Members were as loved as Jack was by his colleagues, which attitude was thoroughly reciprocated by him.

By the same token the passing of few former Members would cause as much deep heartfelt regret as does his going. I know that every Member who served with him heartily joins his successor in his expression of regret and bereavement and in conveying this regret and our sympathy to the bereaved ones. Just as the House can ill afford to lose such illustrious Members, just as his congressional district, fortunate though it was to have available such an able and experienced successor, could ill afford to lose his service in the House, his district, the city of St. Louis, the State of Missouri, and the world can ill afford to lose such a lovable, able, and distinguished citizen. However, all of these are better because of his residence in them, just as we whose privilege it was to serve with him here are better because of having known him.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. O'KONSKI (at the request of Mr. HALLECK) was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. KEATING asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. SCHWABE of Oklahoma asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD in three instances and include excerpts in each.

Mr. VAN ZANDT asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD on the subject of the case against the admirals.

COMMITTEE ON VETERANS' AFFAIRS

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on Rules, I call up House Resolution 120 and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Veterans' Affairs, acting as a whole or by subcommittee, is authorized and directed to conduct an inspection of the Veterans' Administration with a particular view to determining the efficiency of the administration and operation of Veterans' Administration installations.

The committee shall report to the House (or to the Clerk of the House if the House is not in session), as soon as practicable during the present Congress, the results of its inspection, together with such recommendations for legislation as it deems advisable.

For the purposes of this resolution the committee, or any subcommittee thereof, is authorized to sit and act during the present Congress at such times and places within the United States, whether or not the House is sitting, has recessed, or has adjourned, to hold such hearings, to require the attendance of such witnesses and the production of such records, documents, and papers, to administer oaths, and to take such testimony as it deems necessary. Subpenas may be issued under the signature of the chairman of the committee, or by any member designated by such chairman, and may be served by any person designated by such chairman or member.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH].

Mr. Speaker, House Resolution 120, which has been reported by the Committee on Rules, is a resolution authorizing the Committee on Veterans' Affairs, acting either in whole committee or by subcommittee, to conduct an inspection of the Veterans' Administration and its various facilities during the life of the present Congress. At the time this resolution was brought before the Committee on Rules there was concern expressed as to whether the adoption of the resolution, and the inspection authorized thereunder, would reflect upon General Bradley or the Veterans' Administration.

The Committee on Rules was assured by the various members of the Committee on Veterans' Affairs that the introduction of this resolution in no way was to be considered as a reflection upon the services, ability, or patriotism of Gen. Omar Bradley, whom we all recognize has done exceptionally able work in behalf of the veterans of this and other wars.

The resolution was not reported unanimously. There were some objections to reporting it. However, the majority of the committee, feeling that, after all, the Committee on Veterans' Affairs is charged with the responsibility of bringing to the floor of the Congress all legislation on veterans' affairs, which legislation will have a great effect upon the lives and happiness of no only our veterans but of their families, that the committee should have every opportunity to learn everything possible about the way the Veterans' Administration functions and is being conducted.

Certainly, the Congress of the United States has two great responsibilities: First, it is the duty of the Congress to legislate; second, it is the duty of the Congress to investigate. I personally feel very strongly that every committee of Congress should have the opportunity to obtain all possible information, from any and every source, on the subject over which it has legislative jurisdiction. In fact, the Legislative Reorganization Act so provides. I am convinced that it would be virtually impossible for the members of the Committee on Veterans' Affairs to bring to the floor of the House well-considered, well-tempered, and well-seasoned legislation for the benefit of the veterans of our various wars, and at the same time properly protect the interest of the general taxpaying public, without having the authority this resolution confers.

If you will notice the wording of this resolution, you will see that the committee is not empowered to "investigate" the Veterans' Administration, but instead to "inspect" it and its various facilities.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. I yield.

Mr. SABATH. I fully appreciate that the wording is "inspection" and not "investigation." If that is true, why is it necessary for the committee to have the power of subpena and to sit anywhere and everywhere throughout the United States?

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. To answer the gentleman, it is my honest opinion that the committee will never be called upon to use its power of subpena, but when you give a committee authority to inspect, it certainly should have authority to subpena and bring in, if necessary, any of the records or any of the equipment that it may want to inspect. We have a grave responsibility to those who bore the brunt of battle in the hour of the Nation's peril. It is the responsibility of this Congress, representing the people of the United States, to make certain that the affairs of the great Veterans' Administration are being carried on as we, the Congress, and the people want them carried on.

I have great respect for General Bradley, yet I am convinced that General Bradley, being only human, cannot possibly know of everything that is going on within the Veterans' Administration. Perhaps there are things there that we and he would change if we and he knew about them. Certainly, unless the members of this committee see and know for themselves how the work of the Veterans' Administration is carried on, they are not in a good position to even understand what General Bradley may be talking about when he comes before them asking for additional legislation, additional authority, additional facilities, or additional equipment needed to care for our veterans.

I say to you it is just common sense that we, as the Congress, authorize the committee which we have named to represent us on matters pertaining to veterans' legislation to go out into the field and to see for themselves how the Veterans' Administration is functioning, so that when they take the floor of the House in support of or in opposition to legislation which may come before us, that they can tell us that they know whereof they speak from their own personal knowledge and observation.

So I am hopeful that this legislation, just as the sensible thing to do, will be adopted. I know of no reason why it should not be adopted. I know of many reasons, and I have given you a number of them, why it should be adopted.

Again I want to assure you that this resolution is not here today to reflect in any way upon Gen. Omar Bradley or upon any other individual. May I remind you that time is fleeting. Just a moment ago we received word of the passing of one of our old colleagues. General Bradley may not be with us always. He may not be the head of this great Veterans' Administration in the months and years ahead. Administrative heads may change, but the Congress of the United States goes on and on and has a responsibility, not only to the people whose money it spends, some seven billion dollars a year in the conduct of the Veterans' Administration, but also a deep and grave responsibility to the men we are attempting to care for—the veterans of the last World War and of our other wars.

So I am hoping that this resolution will be adopted.

Mr. VAN ZANDT. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr BROWN of Ohio. I yield.

Mr. VAN ZANDT. Is it not true that the mere presence of a congressional committee in a hospital will be of benefit to all the patients?

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. It will certainly demonstrate to the veterans that the Congress of the United States is at least sufficiently interested in their welfare to send representatives of the Congress around to visit them, to find out how their affairs are being handled, and whether they are being taken care of as we desire.

Mr. KEARNEY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. I yield.

Mr. KEARNEY. The gentleman is absolutely correct, and I am glad to hear what he said about General Bradley.

I reiterate that so far as every individual member of this committee is concerned this resolution is not directed at General Bradley. If it were I believe the entire committee would fight it.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. I am sure that is correct. I believe I can also assure the membership that this is not a partisan resolution in any degree.

Mr. VAN ZANDT. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. I yield.

Mr. VAN ZANDT. The gentleman knows that none of the organized veterans is against the resolution. Does the gentleman know of any veteran organization that is opposed to the resolution?

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. I do not. Instead I understand they favor it.

Mr. Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Connecticut has consumed 1½ minutes.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, I yield such time as he may desire to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CANNON].

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks on the life and service of John J. Cochran, to be placed in the RECORD immediately following the announcement of his death.

The SPEAKER. All Members have that privilege.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. COX].

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, I hate a sham wherever I find it. This resolution is a sham. The hearts of my Republican friends are not in it, and I am glad they are not.

Mr. Speaker, I have not asked for this time in order to rasp the Republicans; that does not represent my feeling toward them. I want them to give the country a fine administration. I vote with them often, always when I believe they are right; and just as freely as I vote against my party when I believe it wrong.

This resolution, Mr. Speaker, was reported by the Rules Committee without a single sound reason having been given for its support. After the hearing was over and the committee adjourned you could hear all over this House that the committee asking for the rule had failed to make out a case. They did fail to make out a case. They predicated their reason for wanting the resolution on the assertion that there was a desire and possibly a necessity within the Veterans' Committee to educate new members of the Committee on Veterans' Affairs. Think of it, Mr. Speaker, to set up an investigation of a great department of the Government which carries an indictment against a great soldier who was conscripted and put at the head of this great department simply in order to give a junketing trip to a committee upon the pretense that it was necessary to inform the committee about the business with which they were to deal is worse than being ridiculous and absurd.

General Bradley, as fine a man as ever served the Government, is put under indictment by this resolution for no offense that was ever committed, and for no wrong or shortcoming charged against his department. It is enough to break his heart. If I were the general and this resolution passed, I would hand my commission back to the President.

Mr. Speaker, this resolution was reported without the committee's having even given the general the privilege of coming before the committee and telling the story. Nobody said anything derogatory of the Veterans' Administration, but all went out of their way to testify to the high character, to the fine executive ability, to the great patriotism, to his brilliant record as a soldier, and to the fine service that General Bradley is still rendering the country.

Mr. Speaker, the real reason why this resolution is being offered on this floor today has not been given to you. Kindness, courtesy, and consideration makes it inadvisable that I give you the information now. But you pass this resolution and you make the worst mistake that you have thus far made. I have marveled over the fine way in which you people newly coming into power have conducted yourselves; but, my friends on the Republican side, this is the worst mistake that you could possibly make.

The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BROWN] said that this is not a partisan measure. You are making it a partisan measure. Watch the vote. You are making it a party measure and, Mr. Speaker, that is a mistake. If the Veterans' Administration is functioning admirably, if the general has done nothing of which complaint can fairly be lodged, tell me why, Mr. Speaker, you indict him and put him on trial?

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COX. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. May I ask the gentleman if it is not a fact that the committee which asked for this resolution was unanimous in its request, with the exception of one member? The Democratic members as well as the Republican members appeared before the Rules Committee requesting this authority.

Mr. COX. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. RANKIN], former chairman of the committee, said that this might well be made an inquisitorial matter, letting Members go to these installations and seeing what was going on without going to the trouble and involving the expense and casting a reflection upon General Bradley and his department that the adoption of this resolution would result in. You may say what you please of the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. RANKIN], but he has been worth a thousand of your most able people in this country so far as the veterans are concerned.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. Will the gentleman answer the question?

Mr. COX. What is the question?

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. I asked whether or not it is a fact that every member of the Veterans' Affairs Committee with the exception of the one gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. RANKIN] requested this resolution?

Mr. COX. I will put the question on trial with this statement: Did they not come armed with the single reason that I had named why the resolution should be adopted?

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. I had reasons, and they expressed them.

Mr. COX. What was the reason?

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. The reason was they could not be properly informed to carry on the work of the committee. Now, that might not be a good reason to the gentleman, but it was the reason of those of us who supported the resolution.

Mr. COX. If we must enter upon the policy of educating every new Member who comes to this Congress about work in which he is to be engaged by sending him all over the country at public expense, then, Mr. Speaker, we are making a sorry record of which we will later be ashamed.

Mr. HALLECK. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COX. Yes; I yield with pleasure to my friend.

Mr. HALLECK. Of course, the gentleman knows of my high regard for him.

Mr. COX. The gentleman knows, too, that I have both confidence in and affection for him.

Mr. HALLECK. I would like to bring a little history to the gentleman's attention. I see here the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. RANKIN] to whom the gentleman referred as the one time chairman of the Committee on World War Veterans' Legislation. When I first came to Congress in 1935, it was my good fortune to be assigned to that committee, and I served under the chairmanship of the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. RANKIN]. Along in that session of Congress he said to us that he thought it would be a good idea for the members of the committee to acquaint themselves with the various operations of the Veterans' Administration, and particularly the operation of the veterans' hospitals.

Mr. COX. All right. Let them inquire themselves, but not at the expense of the people of the country.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Georgia has expired.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, I yield the gentleman two additional minutes.

Mr. COX. Let me say to the gentleman that he cannot be proud of the committee for reporting this resolution, because it was the sorriest day's work the committee ever did.

Mr. HALLECK. The gentleman can put whatever interpretation on the action that he wants to. I do not put any such interpretation upon it. But if the gentleman will permit me to conclude, what I undertook to say was that I had never been in a veterans' hospital before, yet I was charged with legislating in respect to them. It was arranged by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. RANKIN] that the members of the committee should visit the various veterans' facilities. Now, the Government spent some little money sending the members of that committee to inspect those various hospitals, but they never spent better money on any occasion. I came back a defender of the Veterans' Administration. And I know this also——

Mr. COX. The gentleman must not take all of my time. Let me say to the gentleman that arrangements can still be made for this opportunity to visit these institutions, if that is the object that you have in mind, and it can be done without the adoption of a resolution that you should never have thought of bringing to the floor of this House.

Mr. HALLECK. The resolution uses the word "inspection" and not "investigation," and that certainly is indicative of what is meant.

Mr. COX. You ask for subpena powers and you know it is an investigation that you intend to make.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Georgia has again expired.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I yield 7 minutes to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. RIZLEY].

Mr. RIZLEY. Mr. Speaker, of course, all of us have the highest regard and respect for the distinguished gentleman from Georgia [Mr. COX], but certainly we do not abrogate to him or the other members of the Committee on Rules the right of doing our thinking on these matters that come before that committee.

Why is this particular thing such a sacred cow? No one appearing before the Veterans' Committee, either Democratic or Republican, said that General Bradley had done any wrong, or that they were going to investigate General Bradley. But here is a huge institution, charged with the responsibility of the general welfare of thousands and hundreds of thousands of veterans in every conceivable category. We are spending approximately $7,000,000,000 of the taxpayers' money. These veterans are taxpayers. Is it ridiculous as my friend from Georgia would have you believe, for the Congress of the United States to study and check into an institution of that magnitude? Why all this terrible fuss, just because a committee set up by this House to handle veterans' affairs has asked for the opportunity of going in and inspecting some of the things that are going on? Does the gentleman from Georgia means that the Democratic member, the gentlewoman from New Mexico [Mrs. LUSK], that kindly, fine lady, had some sinister motive or purpose in mind when she requested this rule? She came before the Rules Committee and said, as did many other minority members of the Veterans' Committee, "We want to know something about this huge institution, the Veterans' Administration."

Is there a Member of Congress who does not daily have dozens and dozens of complaints from veterans over the country and who does not think that it might perhaps be helpful to General Bradley if he knew about some of the things that are going on in the various institutions throughout the land?

Mr. HALLECK. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RIZLEY. I yield to the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. HALLECK. As I remember it, the Reorganization Act impresses upon each standing committee of the House of Representatives the responsibility for making a continuing survey of the various departments and agencies coming within its jurisdiction. It occurs to me that on that basis, if upon no other, this resolution should be supported. May I make this further statement in respect to the subpena power about which the gentleman from Georgia seems so disturbed. It runs in my mind that a very vicious attack was made on the Veterans' Administration a short time ago, and that the person who made that attack was brought before the Committee on Veterans' Affairs and much of the attack was exploded. In other words, instead of the Committee on Veterans' Affairs being in a position against the Veterans' Administration, it was in the position of upholding the Veterans' Administration in the work it was doing.

Mr. RIZLEY. Certainly; the gentleman is correct. While the distinguished gentleman from Mississippi appeared in opposition to this resolution, I do not believe it was more than 2 years ago that he was in here with a resolution asking for the same authority to go into the Veterans' Administration and make inspections, and no one contended then that it was a personal attack upon the Administrator.

Mr. MONRONEY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RIZLEY. I yield to the gentleman from Oklahoma.

Mr. MONRONEY. I quite agree with the gentleman from Oklahoma and the gentleman from Indiana that our rules do impose this task on the standing committee that has the power to legislate and to correct. Such an inspection should not cast any reflection at all on the administration, because all of the committees are charged with making that kind of inspection over the areas of their jurisdiction. May I ask the gentleman, however, if this $25,000 anticipates the employment of special counsel in addition to the four experts provided under the Reorganization Act, who are paid $8,000 a year?

Mr. RIZLEY. I think not. I did not so understand at the time the resolution was under consideration.

Mr. MONRONEY. This is simply to acquaint the Members with the problem?

Mr. RIZLEY. Absolutely.

Mr. KEARNEY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RIZLEY. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. KEARNEY. It has been insinuated on the floor of the House that this is a plot against General Bradley. Has the gentleman heard General Bradley complain about this proposed investigation?

Mr. RIZLEY. I have heard no complaint from General Bradley. I have heard no complaint from anyone except the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RIZLEY. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. As a matter of fact, this resolution does not provide for the appointment of any additional aid of any kind, it contemplates only the use of the present facilities of the committee.

Mr. RIZLEY. I thought I had made that clear.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. May I point out to the gentleman that in the hearings before the Committee on Rules the representatives of both great political parties appeared and asked for this rule. I do not believe I have heard the gentleman from Mississippi opposing this measure on the floor, and I question that he will oppose it because I think he realizes fully that it is necessary.

Mr. RIZLEY. I thought I had made that point very clear, it was not in any manner considered as a partisan matter. The Veterans' Committee were very fair. They were after the scalp of no one. They simply wanted to look into this huge Veterans' Administration that has been set up, to see if they could be of some assistance to the veterans they represent and be in a better position to legislate intelligently.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RIZLEY. I yield to the gentlewoman from Massachusetts.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. I had a talk yesterday with General Bradley lasting three-quarters of an hour or an hour, and at that time General Bradley said he greatly appreciated the cooperation of the committee. He already asked the committee to go into Veterans' Administration installations and go over them and make suggestions. The General is not opposing this resolution. I think he would feel hurt if he thought we had meant the inspection as an attack upon him. Such is not the case. The members of the committee have the highest respect and admiration for General Bradley as a great fighting general and as a man. General Bradley has the most difficult job of any Government official after the President of the United States. We have done this in an effort to help him. I think you will find that General Bradley underneath is very grateful for our help in the running of the biggest insurance business in the world, for one thing, and the running of the biggest medical and surgical department in the world, for another. He welcomes our help and our advice on all his various problems. The Committee on Veterans' Affairs has a very grave responsibility to the veterans, over 18,000,000 persons are now affected by the pending legislation the Committee on Veterans' Affairs has passed. It costs $7,000,000,000 today to carry out the work of the Administration with the various benefits due the veterans. It is a great privilege to be chairman of this committee and to work with the fine, able members who are working on a nonpartisan basis and who are determined to help the ex-service men and women and pass wise legislation.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. ALLEN].

Mr. ALLEN of Louisiana. Mr. Speaker, I am very sorry that this question is to some extent taking on the aspects of a partisan matter. There is no room for partisan politics here. The great Committee on Veterans' Affairs, during the years that I have been a member of it, has never displayed any partisan politics. You could watch us vote in that committee, and yet could not tell which were the Republicans and which were the Democrats from the way we voted on veterans' matters.

May I say at the beginning that I have a very, very high regard for General Bradley. I am one of those who supported General Hines, and I have always supported General Bradley. I am his friend. I do not want anyone to say that the bringing of this resolution to the floor of the House by that committee implies that anyone on the committee is against General Bradley in any shape, form, or fashion. We recognize he is a great soldier, a great man, and a great leader. He is doing a good job. He is doing a very hard job. During my service in this House I have never seen anybody in our Government get as broad a grasp of a most difficult job as quickly as General Bradley has, and that is saying a great deal. He is doing great work. We are behind him and we intend to stay behind him.

This resolution, let me repeat, is not aimed at General Bradley or anybody else in the Veterans' Administration. It is not, and I deeply regret that some of my very dear friends have seen fit to leave that implication, because I feel it is not fair to the Veterans' Committee, which is trying to do a difficult work. I do not feel it is fair to General Bradley, and I am persuaded it is not fair to the veterans themselves. So I will vote to adopt this resolution, and I have no apology in the world to make for supporting it.

General Bradley enjoys the confidence of the committee. I have never heard a single person on that committee say one derogatory thing about General Bradley. We are for him. He knows he can always come to us and find a sympathetic understanding.

But, ladies and gentlemen, we have a terrific responsibility. We are trying to legislate for 20,000,000 Americans who paid a terrible price that our country could live. We are dealing with the biggest item of the budget—amounting to over $7,000,000,000.

If you are going to send people from the Committee on Territories to the islands of the seven seas to look after the islanders, and so forth, as has been done by this House time and time again; if you are going to send people to visit our foreign-affairs offices all over the world, as I think has been done; if you are going to do all of those things, why not let the members of the Committee on Veterans' Affairs go into the hospitals and talk with the men and work with General Bradley to solve the biggest problem that has ever faced this Nation at any time in its peacetime history?

Mr. Speaker, last year we went into the hospitals. We got a lot of good out of it. We saw for ourselves. These visits were well worth while. It helped us, the veterans and the Veterans' Administration. That was not a move against anybody at all. We did that in a constructive, cooperative way. This is not an investigation. It is more of a visitation. Something was said about the power of subpena. I do not care whether the resolution has subpena power in it or not. The objective is for the committee to make these visits so that first-hand information may be obtained to enable the committee to deal with this very, very big problem.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. ALLEN], has expired.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I yield the gentleman two additional minutes.

Mr. CARROLL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ALLEN of Louisiana. Pardon me, please. I have very little time. Last year we went into these hopsitals. We saw the problems. We wrote the present medical bill. General Hawley says now he is able to do a good job under that bill. He said he could not do the job without that medical bill which we wrote as a result of our hearings last year and our visits to the hospitals.

This is not against General Bradley. It is not against the Veterans' Administration. I heard General Bradley say last night that he had over 200,000 employees under him. How can that great, good, and able man know all that is going on? We are going into those hospitals cooperatively, without prejudice, solely with a desire to be helpful to General Bradley and all concerned. This move is in line with the very spirit of the Reorganization Act. It will be to the best interests of General Bradley. He will know he can lean on us in solving the great problems arising every day. It will be to the best interests of the Veterans' Administration, and finally, as God gives us wisdom and light to do this great job, it will be the best thing for the veterans of this country. Help us to do the best possible job for the veterans.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. ALLEN] has again expired.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may desire to the gentleman from New York [Mr. KEARNEY].

Mr. KEARNEY. Mr. Speaker, I favor the passage of this resolution.

Mr. Speaker, in supporting House Resolution 120, I do so in the belief that as a member of the Veterans' Affairs Committee, each and every one of the members of that committee is a guardian of American veterans over whom the Veterans' Administration has some jurisdiction, particularly those of our disabled now in the hospitals throughout the country. As members of this committee, we of necessity must be fully informed in the operations of the Veterans' Administration, including the regional offices, the hospitals, and the central office here in Washington. Let me say at the outset that this resolution is not aimed at any investigation of Gen. Omar N. Bradley. If I thought it were, I would be the first to fight it. General Bradley, in the short time he has been the Veterans' Administrator, has done a most magnificent job. He is a soldier's soldier, one of our foremost combat generals in World War II, and an administrator of veterans' affairs in whom the entire country has great confidence. It is also true that as Administrator of the Veterans' Administration, General Bradley has not only the hospitals under his charge and control but also has a total of over 200,000 employees. This Veterans' Administration is big business, and I reiterate that it is our job as members of the Veterans' Affairs Committee to be thoroughly informed of all its activities.

This resolution is not an investigation in the true sense of the word "investigation." While it is true that an investigation may develop as a result of the findings of the committee or subcommittees sent out through the various regions, our primary motive is to inform ourselves fully as to the conduct of the affairs of the entire Veterans' Administration.

We have on our committee several new Members of the House, many of whom served their country in World War II, in combat all over the world. They are earnest, diligent, and intelligent members of this great committee. I believe that as a result of the passage of this resolution, particularly those new Members will be able to journey out through the country and learn for themselves what this Veterans' Administration is doing in the operation of the care for our disabled men and women; and the administration of claims, both for compensation, insurance, educational benefits, and so forth, incidental to the operation of the Administration.

There must be periodic visits in the field if we are to report back intelligently to the House appropriate legislation. In order to do our job as the Members of the House expect us to do it, Resolution 120 should be adopted unanimously.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I yield 4 minutes to the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. MILLER].

Mr. MILLER of Connecticut. Mr. Speaker, I am surprised that there is any opposition to this resolution. I would vote for it if the word "investigation" were contained in the resolution. I would not feel I was casting any aspersions at General Bradley, even if we proposed to investigate his agencies in a cooperative way. I do not think he would object to that kind of an investigation. I am reminded today of the first time I met the gentlewoman from Massachusetts [Mrs. ROGERS], now chairman of the Committee on World War Veterans' Legislation. It was in the early twenties. I was a patient in a Government hospital in Boston. We were visited by the gentlewoman from Massachusetts [Mrs. ROGERS], whose husband was then a respected Member of this House. The gentlewoman from Massachusetts [Mrs. ROGERS] was touring the country visiting veterans' hospitals. She came into that hospital and had occasion to talk with any patient who wanted to talk to her. Most of them did. She got a lot of information from that visit, and the patients in that hospital felt that they had talked to somebody from Washington who would take back their stories of the conditions that existed in the hospital at that time, most of which were good. Some of them were not so good.

There are things going on in the Veterans' Administration facilities around the country that are not what General Bradley would want them to be. I think this committee, visiting those installations and facilities, will get a great deal of information and will give the patients in those hospitals an opportunity to talk to their elected representatives. I visit every veterans' facility in my State frequently, but it is one thing for me to go in and talk to the manager and get what information I can as a Member of Congress or as a private citizen. I have been treated just as cordially in both instances; and it is another thing for an official committee, backed by a resolution of this House, to go in and look it over.

The subpena power may never be used, but if some minor official does not want to cooperate with the committee, or its representative, they will have the power to make them produce their records or to make them talk. I think they should have that power even though they may never use it.

I hope to submit to the committee, or some member of the committee, a few questions I would like to have answered about the operations of the Veterans' Administration. I do not want to mention them on the floor. I would like to have them quietly looked into by some official representative of this House. If the information I have it correct, there are certain conditions that can be improved.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MILLER of Connecticut. I yield.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. As I understand it, approximately half the membership of this committee is composed of new members, most of whom are veterans of World War II. In the gentleman's opinion is it not a good idea that these individuals have an opportunity to see and know what is going on in these veterans' hospitals? They are the true representatives of the veterans in the Congress.

Mr. MILLER of Connecticut. I think it should be done not only this year but by every Congress. I do not know what it would cost to send the members of this committee to the various cities to visit these facilities, but what if it does cost $25,000? We are dealing with a $7,000,000,000 appropriation and with hundreds of thousands of human lives. I want not only the members of this committee but the entire membership of the Congress to go into these hospitals and into every facility operated by the Veterans' Bureau so that they can have first-hand information on what is going on.

I thought one of the objectives of the reorganization bill was to give to the committees of the House a better opportunity to study the agencies over which they have legislative jurisdiction. The Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee of the House has been doing something along the same line, but we did not have to go out and investigate and look over every telegraph line or power plant in the country. We requested representatives of the FCC, the Federal Communications Commission, the CAA, the FPC, and the rest of them, to bring information to the committee.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Connecticut has expired.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. RANKIN].

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, I am not opposed to visiting veterans' hospitals or veterans' facilities. I have insisted on it all the way along, and I have insisted that every Member of Congress go through veterans' hospitals and veterans' facilities at every opportunity.

But here is the part of this resolution to which I am opposed, the part that gives the power to require the attendance of witnesses, production of records, documents, and papers, to administer oaths, and so on and so forth. Last year we made a thorough investigation of the Veterans' Administration. We heard all the charges made against the Administration. We saw stuff put into the record, quoting men, servicemen, and when we ran them down we found that as a rule they were statements made by men who were insane.

We had two propagandists writing attacks on the Veterans' Administration, and when they were brought before the bar of the committee their statements were invariably found to be false. We went to all of that trouble and expense and investigated veterans' facilities from one end of the country to the other.

We found some things that were wrong. They have been corrected. The Veterans' Administration is doing a splendid job and I do not want to see it unnecessarily harassed to the detriment of the veterans themselves.

I want to substitute the provisions of the resolution we have always adopted for visiting these veterans' hospitals and veterans' facilities. I want to strike out the last paragraph and insert:

That said committee or subcommittees are empowered to sit during the sessions of Congress or during the recess between sessions of Congress, and to incur necessary expenses for transportation and subsistence, and for clerical and stenographic services, which shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the House upon vouchers signed by the chairman thereof, and approved by the Committee on House Administration.

Mr. MILLER of Connecticut. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield briefly?

Mr. RANKIN. I yield.

Mr. MILLER of Connecticut. Did the people writing those libelous stories appear before the gentleman's committee voluntarily?

Mr. RANKIN. We had the power of subpena; it was an investigation.

Mr. MILLER of Connecticut. We might run into that situation again.

Mr. RANKIN. If they find there is anything wrong in any of these facilities let them come back and report it to the committee and then let a separate resolution be adopted by the committee to investigate a particular facility, and I am sure the Congress will back them up.

What I am opposed to here is the wording and the powers it carries. In my opinion, when you adopt this resolution the story will go out to the country that you have started a Nation-wide investigation of veterans' facilities, veterans' regional offices, and veterans' hospitals. In my opinion, it will do more harm than good. We had better follow the policy we have been following.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RANKIN. I yield.

Mr. COX. Could not the purpose the gentleman desires effectuated be accommodated by striking the word "and inspection" out of the third line and the tenth line, and then striking out the rest of the section?

Mr. RANKIN. I have the amendment prepared, I may say to the gentleman from Georgia, and it reads as follows:

Mr. RANKIN moves to strike line 12, page 1, and all of page 2 from line 1 down to and including line 11, and insert the following.

Then insert the provisions which I have just read and which we have adopted in all our former resolutions for inspection.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Mississippi has expired.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, I yield the gentleman two additional minutes.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, if you are going on an inspection trip, then let us be honest about it and make it an inspection and not a camouflaged investigation, or inquisition that would do more harm than good.

Mr. COX. That will take away the unfavorable part of it.

Mr. RANKIN. And it will give the Veterans' Affairs Committee all the power it needs. So far as I know, not a single veterans' organization came before the committee and asked for any such inquisition or that such power be granted. So, if I get a chance, I am going to offer a motion to strike the last part of this resolution and insert the provision I have quoted. That will do the work.

Mr. Speaker, I went on this committee at the request of Finis J. Garrett, minority leader, 22 years ago. I was chairman of the committee for 16 years, and my whole services in that capacity have been in the interest of the servicemen of this country. Do not forget that untold thousands of these men are mental patients, thousands of them are tubercular patients, and the less you disturb them the better off they will be.

I am opposed to putting on an inquisition at this time when I know it is unnecessary.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself the remaining time on this side.

WORSE MISTAKES STILL TO COME

Mr. Speaker, since it is not unusual for me to disagree with either the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. RANKIN], or the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. COX], you will not be surprised if I beg to disagree again with their statement that this investigation is the worst mistake the Republicans have made.

They have made many worse in the past, and I am confident they will make many worse in the future. The results of the current Gallup poll show that they are making so many that soon they will be deprived of the opportunity to make them at will.

However, I do agree, and I am most regretful that it is for the first time in many years, with both gentlemen that this proposed investigation is unnecessary and wasteful, and that in view of the thorough and repeated investigations made in the last Congress it is sheer extravagance to expend the $25,000 involved here, especially when Republicans prate daily of economy. Again they are spending the taxpayers' money unnecessarily.

It is a pleasure to find myself once more in agreement with my friend and colleague, the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. COX], and with the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. RANKIN], and hope sincerely that I can look forward to continued cooperation.

The gentleman stated correctly that he had, in the past, voted many times in agreement with the Republicans and against the Democrats, always to my regret, for I am very fond of him and dislike to see him do things I know he will regret. I am afraid that both of my friends now are finding out, now as they will in the future, that they can hope for no reciprocity from the Republican side. They respond to the crack of the party line like cattle, and forget all friendliness in the past.

OUTSTANDING ADMINISTRATORS

Some object to this inspection, which I believe will be actually another snooping investigation, because of the subpena power. Everyone claims that General Bradley and his aide are two of the most outstanding, capable, courageous, and honest men in Government, and that they are conducting the affairs of the Veterans' Administration as economically and efficiently as possible.

Who made this request for an investigation? Not a soul has appeared that I know of asking for it. The American Legion did not ask for it. No other veterans' organization has asked for it. So why force it at this time? Of course, it is claimed that this will be a junket. Personally, I do not think that is the intention, nevertheless these Members want to travel around some. In my opinion, many of them need a lot of information about our country so that they can legislate properly in the future and so that they will not always vote as they are dictated to by the powers that be.

WOULD SAVE MINORITY FROM MISTAKES

Mr. Speaker, I know that this resolution will pass. I am not going to make certain statements that have been suggested to me because I do not want to be unfair. I always try to be helpful to the present minority and save them from making many more mistakes that they are apt to make.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SABATH. I yield to my genial and pleasant colleague.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. I want to assure the gentleman that we equally appreciate the grave concern he has for the welfare of the majority. He has been very, very helpful, many, many times.

Mr. SABATH. I thank the gentleman for his acknowledgment. I am just as much interested as any man in seeing that our veterans obtain the best possible treatment that we can provide for them, and if I thought they were not receiving that kind of treatment, naturally, I would favor the resolution. But the fact is that there are no charges, no complaints, no requests from anywhere, with the exception of the Members, as has been stated, who desire to make a trip at Government expense.

CAN GO ON JUNKET ANYWAY

They can make it without this resolution. There is nothing that would stop them to go and visit the hospitals in their districts as well as the adjoining districts. They have the right and they have the power. In view of the testimony that has been given by Democrats and Republicans alike as to General Bradley's wonderful conduct, I do not see why you should pass this resolution, and I think in the interest of real service to the veterans the resolution should be withdrawn or, at least, amended as has been suggested by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. Cox].

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WALTER].

Mr. WALTER. Mr. Speaker, I see nothing in this resolution of a political nature. It certainly seems to me that, if we consider the fact that General Bradley inherited a tremendous operation, the activities of which have been expanded a hundredfold, he should welcome the information that the splendid Committee on Veterans' Affairs will unquestionably provide him with. Nobody intends by this resolution to cast any reflection on General Bradley. But we must bear in mind the fact that after the last war the Veterans' Administration was conducted in a scandalous manner. Conceivably this investigation would point out the pitfalls to the present Administrator and guard him against the scandals that might arise now.

I hope this resolution is adopted. All of us are interested in the veteran, of course, and we should welcome the opportunity of receiving whatever information we possibly can so as to benefit our veterans in every possible way.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WALTER. I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. McCORMACK. Certainly, if in the wisdom of the House this power should be given to any committee, the Committee on Veterans' Affairs is the committee that should receive the power.

Mr. WALTER. Of course, and under the Reorganization Act, it is the duty of the Committee on Veterans' Affairs to conduct the investigation contemplated under this resolution.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I yield 1 minute to the gentlewoman from New Mexico [Mrs. LUSK].

Mrs. LUSK. Mr. Speaker, I speak on behalf of House Resolution 120. We have the greatest respect for General Bradley and the work he is trying to do, but the members of this committee are all new. Many of them are veterans just out of World War II. Because we realize that the work of this committee will touch the lives of more citizens, perhaps, than the work of any other committee of this House, we feel that the most we can do will not be enough to understand the problems of our people. For that reason, we are asking for an opportunity to visit various centers and hospitals in order that we may know first-hand the feeling of the people within those centers and hospitals and may take proper action to do the things that they would have done.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. VAN ZANDT].

Mr. VAN ZANDT. Mr. Speaker, one of the finest tributes paid this resolution was contained in the statement by the gentlewoman from New Mexico [Mrs. LUSK] who had three sons in World War II, one of whom did not return. When the gentlewoman from New Mexico [Mrs. LUSK] stands in the well of this House and supports this resolution, I feel that she speaks for the many mothers and fathers of the United States whose sons made the supreme sacrifice.

Mr. Speaker, some years ago it was my privilege to serve one of the great veterans' organizations of this country as its national commander. Immediately after concluding my tenure of office I was elected to the Congress of the United States. As a leader of an organized veteran group and as a Representative in Congress it was my privilege and honor to visit every single Veterans' Administration hospital within the confines of the United States.

As I visited the veterans at the various hospitals and shook their hands I realized that I was making a contribution to their welfare, by simply listening to their problems and giving them words of encouragement. As commander in chief of the Veterans of Foreign Wars of the United States I brought their problems to Washington and discussed them with such distinguished Members of Congress as John McCormack, John Rankin, Royal Johnson, now deceased, Mrs. Rogers and others. After I was elected to Congress and as a member of the House Committee on World War Veterans' Affairs these problems were more forcibly presented to my colleagues.

Mr. BURLESON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VAN ZANDT. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. BURLESON. Which does the gentleman think has the greatest opportunity really to find out the conditions in a veterans' hospital, the American Legion or an investigating committee of this Congress?

Mr. VAN ZANDT. The major veteran organizations are watchdogs over these hospitals, and naturally are of great assistance in handling complaints of patients. However, a congressional investigating committee has the knack of securing factual information that ordinarily would be withheld by patients.

Mr. BURLESON. Will the gentleman yield for an observation?

Mr. VAN ZANDT. Surely.

Mr. BURLESON. I say this very meekly and I say it very humbly, and perhaps I will never be put on a committee to make a tour of the country on an investigation, but I have seen some congressional investigations overseas of this, that, and the other, and I have seen some congressional investigating committees—please understand me; this is not too critical—that never found out a great deal about what they were looking at. If I were going out to make an investigation of anything I would spend about 3 weeks. I would really know what I was looking for. I would not walk down the hall of a hospital——

Mr. VAN ZANDT. I yielded for a question.

Mr. BURLESON. I thank the gentleman very much. I am sorry to take that much time.

Mr. VAN ZANDT. In my humble opinion one of the greatest contributions we could make to the welfare of veterans in hospitals is to support this resolution and thereby make possible inspection tours of Veterans' Administration hospitals by members of the House Committee on Veterans' Affairs.

Mr. KEARNEY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VAN ZANDT. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. KEARNEY. While we are speaking about investigating committees, let us be fair on this subject. Is it not true that while the gentleman was in the South Pacific many investigating committees came out there to investigate him and his comrades?

Mr. VAN ZANDT. That is right.

Mr. KEARNEY. Is it not true that the House Committee on the Territories and other committees have gone around the country and other places in the world making their own investigations?

Mr. VAN ZANDT. That is correct.

Mr. KEARNEY. Just as in the case of the Inspector General of the Army, it is the duty of this committee to be properly advised as to what is going on in these hospitals and the regional offices.

Mr. VAN ZANDT. It has not been so many months ago that I was ordered by my commanding officer to proceed to Manila and there act as an aide to a congressional committee investigating conditions in the Philippines, then under the command of the greatest soldier that ever lived, Gen. Douglas MacArthur. So, investigations are nothing new or novel, and an investigation of these hospitals will prove of practical value by providing veterans with a real remedy for any just complaint.

If amendments were in order, I would propose that Members of the House who visit the various hospitals should talk to the boys and learn their problems. At the same time it would be a good idea to take along some cigars, cigarettes, and candy, and in general have an enjoyable visit with the boys. Such a spirit of comradeship would prove a stimulating tonic and of real value to the veterans and Members of Congress.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VAN ZANDT. I yield to the gentlewoman from Massachusetts.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. A Member going through the hospital will also be able to find out whether any doctors or surgeons stay after 4 o'clock or on Saturday and Sunday so that they can perform emergency work if an emergency should arise.

Mr. VAN ZANDT. The gentlewoman is correct.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. Speaker, I rise in favor of this resolution. Recognizing that the duty of the Congress is to see that all veterans are properly represented before the Government departments, I believe that such a resolution as this will bring about better relations between the veteran and his Government. I have no doubt that the Veterans' Administration itself would have no objection to an inspection of its operation and this resolution calls for exactly that.

The Congress of the United States, acting for all the people of the country, has provided so enlightened a program for the relief of those who have defended this Nation in time of war that we are admired throughout the world. We have indeed attempted to show our gratitude for the sacrifices which our fighting men have made.

It is, then, our duty to see that the laws which the Congress has enacted are properly administered. It is our duty to see that every veteran is permitted to enjoy every privilege and right which has been granted him by his grateful Government.

I am one of those who feel that the Veterans' Administration is inefficient. So large an undertaking as this, expending billions of dollars annually, is bound to make mistakes and to be cumbersome in some parts of its operation, and this Congress, by the passage of this resolution, can smooth out those inefficiencies and bring about, not only better service to those who deserve it, but better Government and a more economical administration of the functions of this department.

I take the liberty at this time of calling to your attention several specific cases of inefficiency and maladministration in order to show to you gentlemen that this tremendous operation is stumbling over itself in failing to carry out the duties as provided in the legislation previously enacted by the Congress. Let me tell you a few instances wherein the veterans in my section, justifiably, complain of inexcusable delays. Here is one. A student at a theological college within my district entered that college in September of last year. Although he has tried every possible way to get his allowance he has never received one answer to the number of letters he has written to the Dallas veterans' office. He wrote to me on March 3 that he was still being accorded this same sort of treatment, appealing for help. His Government has allotted to him $90 per month and he has received not one cent for the last 6 months. Is this what Congress intended? Let me give you another illustration.

In May 1946 a veteran within my district signed up to take advantage of the on-the-job training program. Although this man, who had spent 43 months in the jungles of the Southwest Pacific, had importuned repeatedly the Veterans' Administration for payment of his subsistence, he has not yet received one check; and, gentlemen, he began his on-the-job training in May of 1946. The company was approved and other veterans who were working alongside this man were receiving their monthly allowances.

Mr. Speaker, I could give dozens of illustrations, but let me conclude with this final example of the inefficiency of the Dallas veterans' office. A young veteran who is receiving on-the-job training appealed to me in a letter dated February 8 to assist him in securing the full payment to which he was entitled. The Veterans' Administration had failed, over a period of 4 months, to make satisfactory adjustment of his allowance. On February 12 I wired the Dallas office and requested a report. Gentlemen, to this very hour I have not received an answer to that telegram. Is not a Member of Congress entitled to at least the courtesy of an acknowledgment of his communication?

I have experienced just such delays in many previous communications and have been compelled to appeal to the officials of the Veterans' Administration here in an effort to get information on specific cases which have arisen in my district.

Let me conclude by assuring the Members of this House that I do not in any way criticize Gen. Omar Bradley. He is doing a very good job, and my purpose in supporting this resolution is to assist him in performing a better job and to provide for the veterans, not only in my district, but throughout the Nation, that service to which they are duly entitled.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the resolution.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BROWN] yield for a parliamentary inquiry?

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. I do not yield, Mr. Speaker. I have moved the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. LEWIS asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in two instances and include a newspaper article in each instance.

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. MANSFIELD of Montana asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include an article from the Progressive of March 3, 1947, by Richard Neuberger.

Mr. McDOWELL asked and was given permission to revise and extend his remarks and include a newspaper article.

The SPEAKER. Under previous order of the House, the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. KEFAUVER] is recognized for 45 minutes.

BETTER COOPERATION NECESSARY BETWEEN LEGISLATIVE AND EXECUTIVE BRANCHES OF GOVERNMENT

Mr. KEFAUVER. Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that since the United States is obviously now in the position where it must assume more and more leadership in the international field and we, the Congress, are being called upon to establish and deal with international policy to an extent that this country has never known before, we should examine our congressional procedure to see whether we are really equipped properly as a legislative body to adequately handle the problems being thrust upon us.

On the domestic front, there is great need for better understanding between the legislative and executive branches of our Government. Several days ago I read an editorial by Marquis Childs in the Washington Post. I would like to read the first two paragraphs. It says:

> Underlying nine-tenths of the confusion and conflict in Washington today is one central, paramount fact that almost no one speaks about or thinks about. It is almost as though a deliberate conspiracy existed to prevent us from considering it.
> When the two corollary powers, executive and legislative, are divided between opposing parties, the machine of government stalls. This has happened again and again and again. Yet we register a kind of puzzled and hurt surprise that all is not harmony and progress on the Potomac.

For many, many years there has been evident need and advocacy of some procedure which will bridge the gap between Capitol Hill and the other end of Pennsylvania Avenue. Even when the Executive and the legislative members of our Government are of the same party, bickerings and differences between the legislative and the Executive commence very soon after the inauguration. I believe that regardless of whether we have a Democrat or a Republican in the White House, or whether we have Republican control or Democratic control of the Congress, Members of both branches sincerely and earnestly want to make the Government work efficiently for the best interests of America. Nowadays it is imperative that Government function smoothly. In this way we can take our place of effective leadership in world affairs. Both of the political parties are devoted to those two objects. We know that the time comes when there is lack of understanding and differences between the President and the Congress, regardless of whether or not there is a person of the same party in the White House as in control of the Congress. For many years I have been advocating a proposal which I think will do much to bring about closer cooperation and understanding between the President and the Congress. Now that we do have a situation which I think has occurred some 28 times in our history, of divided responsibility between the Presidency and one or the other Houses of Congress, it seems to me it is all the more important that we try to devise ways and means to come to a better understanding and better working together with our national program.

The proposal that I have made this year, as in several years past, is for a so-called report-and-questioning period. It is contained in House Resolution 17. Under that proposal it is provided that once every week, or at least every 2 weeks, there should be set aside not more than 2 hours on the floor of the House for some legislative committee of the House to have the opportunity of inviting a Cabinet member or a top administrator to appear in the Chamber of the House to answer questions previously submitted to him by the legislative committee which issued the invitation. The first half of the time would be devoted to the Cabinet member answering written questions previously submitted, and the second half consumed by questions from the floor. The chairman of the committee and the ranking minority member would control the time for asking questions.

The Rules Committee would fix the order of appearance, in the event more than one request was pending.

Here is an example of how this program would operate: Suppose when Secretary Marshall returns from Moscow, the Foreign Affairs Committee of the House should feel it important that his message be heard by all the Members of the House and such Members of the Senate as might wish to come over. Under this proposal the Foreign Affairs Committee would contact Secretary Marshall, arrange a time, and discuss the agenda. They would prepare questions to be printed in the RECORD 2 days before the hearing. On the date of his appearance, one-half of the allotted time, whether it were 1 hour or 2 hours, would be taken by the Secretary in a discussion of the questions furnished him or agreed upon by him with the members of the Foreign Affairs Committee. After his report, the members of the Foreign Affairs Committee, or any Member of the House, by securing permission from the chairman or the ranking minority member, could ask him supplemental questions which, however, must be germane to the preceding discussion. It would not be a period of heckling. If an improper question were asked, since the Cabinet member came voluntarily, he would not have to answer it. The Speaker could rule the question out of order as not being germane. A point of order could be made by any Member to an improper question.

Mr. HALLECK. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KEFAUVER. I yield to the distinguished majority leader.

Mr. HALLECK. Does not that statement indicate that the members of the executive department would tell us just what they wanted to tell us and nothing else? Does it not follow what they probably are doing now, telling us what they want us to know and not telling us what they do not want us to hear?

Mr. KEFAUVER. I do not think that would be the result at all. What I had reference to as an improper question was a question for heckling purposes or something entirely aside from the point of discussion. I have in mind, of course, that in the case of Secretary Marshall there would perhaps be some matters involving national security that it would be proper for him to refuse to answer in a public appearance.

I am certain that these would be periods of real cooperation between the Cabinet officer and the Members of Congress.

Mr. HALLECK. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. KEFAUVER. I yield.

Mr. HALLECK. I have felt many times during my service in the Congress that we have been required to legislate in a vacuum, particularly insofar as legislation dealing with our foreign affairs was concerned.

I am convinced that for us to know more about what is going on and what is really before us would be helpful in arriving at the right solution. Does the gentleman believe, however, having regard to the present controversies and difficulties that seem to be coming up to confront us, that General Marshall would feel it proper for him to respond to inquiries that might be addressed to him in respect to the problems involved in our foreign affairs at this time?

Mr. KEFAUVER. I am glad the gentleman asked that question. I believe General Marshall appreciates the fact that the foreign policy of the United States is one that must be understood and participated in by Members of both the Senate and the House. No foreign policy can long last unless it has public support and implementation from the Members of the House of Representatives. And an indication, I may say to the gentleman from Indiana, of the way I think Secretary Marshall would respond to an invitation of this kind can be found in what General Marshall did during the war. The gentleman will recall that on two, if not three, occasions, General Marshall in connection with the conduct of the war and the necessity of congressional understanding of what was being done, and of congressional support of the war effort, even went to the extent of arranging meetings in the auditorium of the Library of Congress. I am sure the gentleman attended those meetings. General Marshall spoke on those occasions, as did General Eisenhower, Secretary Stimson, Under Secretary and later Secretary Patterson. Who were the audience they had on those occasions? They were Members of Congress who were eager to know what the overall picture was. These leaders of our war effort were anxious that the Members of Congress should have a full and complete picture.

The only trouble on those occasions was they told us exactly what they wanted us to hear. We were more or less like school children sitting there to get the message. We had no opportunity of talking with them before the discussion and suggesting matters we wanted them to discuss or of asking questions during the course of the discussion. How much better it would be to have them appear here in our own forum and for us to have an opportunity to participate.

Mr. VORYS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KEFAUVER. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. VORYS. I wanted to point out just the point the gentleman has made, and that is that in these very interesting meetings which General Marshall conducted during the war there was no opportunity to ask questions. Also, I want to point out that often if there had been such opportunity, there would have been no possibility for the public to know what his answers were. This system has worked in parliamentary countries right through the war. When questions were legitimately embarrassing, those questions were not answered. On the other hand, when perfectly proper questions were asked and when cabinet members in other countries avoided those questions, the public knew about that. Very often that cabinet member had to come around and explain what the answer was and also why he had not answered. If the gentleman will indulge me a moment further, I would appreciate it.

Mr. KEFAUVER. I am happy to indulge the gentleman as long as he wishes. The gentleman and I have discussed this matter a long time, and I feel it is really his idea, that he is really the sponsor of a proposal of this kind. He saw and expressed the need of a plan like this long before I did. I hope the gentleman will take the lead in its sponsorship.

Mr. VORYS. The gentleman flatters me. I have long been interested in this proposal, and while I was interested in it at previous sessions of Congress, I feel it is of great importance at the present session of Congress when each of the Cabinet members would be of one party and when the control on the Hill is in the other party. It is true that such a question period would give the Cabinet officer a chance to tell his side of the story to all of the Congress at once and to the country as well. Now, that is a good thing, because it would save that Cabinet officer's time in running around to as many as eight or nine different committee hearings in the period of a week, as has been the case in certain instances in the past. This procedure would save the time of the Cabinet officer in answering questions of general interest to Congressmen and to their constituents. In the first place, it would save the time of repeated congressional hearings and, in the second place, it would save his time spent in conferences with Congressmen and Senators and on the phone answering their questions. So it would be of advantage to the Cabinet officer, and I am sure he would take advantage of it to tell his views in this public and important way. On the other hand, it would be of great advantage, it seems to me, to those of us, who might not appreciate or understand or agree with the point of view of the Cabinet officer. It would give us a chance to get his answers in public, and then it would give us the opportunity later on, possibly on the same day, to give our comments on his answers. In this way you would have a tighter, more adequate system for the exchange of views between Capitol Hill and the executive departments, which would be of great benefit to the Republic.

Of course, if this system were instituted, we might have some few members who would try to take undue advantage of it. It is a possibility, although I hope an improbable one, that there might be publicity seekers who would attempt unduly to put a Cabinet officer or other Government official on the spot in an unfair way. There would be two remedies in case such a situation arose. One would be the remedy which I understand the gentleman's proposal provides, and that is that the Speaker would interrupt or would stop an obviously improper question, or that the Cabinet officer would himself refuse to answer it.

There would be a second remedy, however, for improper or unfair questions, and that would be the remedy of public opinion. When you get this arrangement going you will find that the American people who appreciate the spirit of fair play in any sort of public discussion would be quick to resent and show their resentment if a Member of Congress acted unfairly. I firmly believe that the American public and the press and the radio commentators would be just as quick to resent and to show their resentment if a Cabinet officer took unfair advantage of his position here on the floor. So that not only in the rules that the gentleman has set up, but in traditions, customs, and precedents that would be established almost immediately, you would have the sort of exchange that goes on during the question period, for instance, in the British Parliament, where several matters are cleaned up in a short time, with a saving of time to the Cabinet officials, furnishing great clarification to the Members of Parliament sitting there, and explaining the many situations to the public. I certainly feel that this is an experiment worth trying.

I ask the gentleman to forgive this long interruption.

Mr. KEFAUVER. I want to say to the gentleman that I am glad he made his excellent contribution to this discussion. I am sure that the Members of Congress will be greatly interested in the viewpoint of the gentleman from Ohio. We all recognize that he is one of the leading authorities on congressional procedures in the Congress.

Let us examine some of the other reasons why a plan like this should be adopted. In these days there are many great issues with which the Congress has to deal. They transcend the interest of any one committee. There are matters of foreign affairs, as well as matters relating to taxes. Even today we passed a resolution to investigate the Veterans' Administration. Would it not be a very healthy thing if the Committee on Veterans' Affairs, under proper rules, could have General Bradley come here and discuss the veterans' rehabilitation program and ask him just what is being done? You know, it is impossible for the Members of Congress, or most of them, to attend all of the committee meetings of their own committee, let alone going to the 15 or 16 other committees to hear matters of great public concern which may be brought out by witnesses testifying before them. We need some method here where the Members of the House can keep currently advised of the position of the Government and the plans of the departments on these great issues that transcend the jurisdiction of any one committee. There is no way that we can do that now. The best thing we can do is try to read the committee hearings. Well, you cannot read all of the committee hearings. That is a physical impossibility. The hearings on an appropriation bill, with 1,000 or 2,000 pages of fine print, is an example. If you read all of them, you might have a pretty good picture of what some particular department or section downtown is doing. But we might as well recognize the physical limitations. It cannot be done.

Mr. HOBBS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KEFAUVER. I yield to the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. HOBBS. The gentleman is making a very illuminating and wise, and, to my mind, a statesmanlike statement, and I hate to interrupt. But I do so merely to request, as I have in the past, the privilege of associating myself with his remarks by saying a fervent amen.

Mr. KEFAUVER. I thank the gentleman. That is substantial support and assistance, which I am glad to have. The views of the gentleman from Alabama carry great weight.

The other method by which we are supposed to keep advised of what the departments are doing is through the reading of the annual reports filed with the Congress by the various departments. I have been here almost 8 years. I must say that I have never read any one of the great voluminous annual reports, resembling a Sears, Roebuck catalog. And, besides, they are post mortems. In those reports the administrators tell pretty much what they want to tell about how their department has been conducted. The crying need of the Congress of the United States is for some method to keep currently advised of problems, policies, difficulties, and plans of the executive agencies of our Government. This is the best method I know of doing that. If we try this method and it does not work, we do not have to issue any invitations. But certainly let us at least give it a trial.

Mr. Speaker, there is a further matter of importance that this procedure would affect. The gentleman from Ohio referred to it. We must recognize that during the years Congress has lost some prestige. Look at almost any newspaper and you see where a Cabinet member has had a press conference. What that Cabinet officer said at his press conference—and I am not blaming him—usually takes the headlines. But you have to go to the inside pages to find out what went on in the two great Houses of Congress. Yet the Congress is supposed to be the predominant branch of our Government. If we could have occasions of report and question period, the great news to the Nation would come from the Halls of Congress and not from the press conferences of the members of the executive departments. On the occasions of these periods the galleries would be packed, the newspapers and the radios would carry full reports about what took place on the floor of the House of Representatives. It would do much to help restore the prestige and the standing of the Congress of the United States.

Mr. VORYS. If the gentleman will indulge me further, may I call attention to one way in which this might improve relations between the Hill and the departments? Possibly the gentleman is going to comment on it. If, as, and when questions are presented in advance for answer by the Cabinet official, in many instances he gives the answers informally in advance to the Member, or he explains in advance why it would be difficult to give a full answer. The whole matter is then cleared up before it ever gets to the floor. That is the way the system operates in parliamentary countries that use this system, in that many of the questions which are propounded are not reached on the floor because they have already been disposed of to the satisfaction of the Member and of the official. On the other hand, if the questions are of such a nature that both the Member and the official feel that a statement should be made on them that can also be done. By this system every Member of Congress will be sure that his question will get attention right at the top of any department, instead of having many of the questions on routine matters go to the departments and be kicked around in the mail there for some time before some assistant down the line gets around to answering them.

While the gentleman has been discussing questions of momentous import which might be answered by means of this system, I think it would be wise to bear in mind that many details of government and many criticisms of departmental action could be cleaned up in this way: First, by making sure that they would get attention by the official involved; and, second, by being explained and answered here on the floor of the House. And if the answer is not satisfactory, then it would be time for the Congress to take action, which, of course, is the fundamental reason why the discussion period would be so important.

Mr. KEFAUVER. The gentleman is entirely correct, and I again thank him.

I think this also would be true. Suppose the Committee on Veterans' Affairs was going to ask General Bradley to appear on the floor of the House 2 weeks hence. That fact would be known. Any Member of the House would have an opportunity of filing questions with the Committee on Veterans' Affairs. On the basis of those questions, the general discussion would be decided.

Also I would point out that the questions which would not be asked would be in the files of the committee which would be turned over to General Bradley. He would see that the Member who wanted information and had filed the question with the committee obtained the information that was desired. It would do away with many of the difficulties which cause so much friction between the Cabinet members and the Congress.

I also call attention to the very wholesome effect that this would have on the Cabinet members and the administrators. It would be like the situation with reference to bank examiners. The bank official keeps his house in order because he knows the bank examiner is eventually going to come around. He may not come this month or he may not come for 6 months, but sooner or later he is going to come and examine the condition of the bank. So it is with an administrator. He might not be called for 6 months or a year, and he would not know when Congress was going to invite him to come to the floor of the House to give an accounting of his administration of the program laid out by the Congress and to explain how he is carrying out the congressional intent as contained in the legislation of the Congress. So he would keep his house in good order.

What I am going to say now is not with reference to any Cabinet member. We have a very splendid Cabinet. But Presidents would be even more careful in the selection of Cabinet members if such members were called to give reports here on the floor of the House. He would have to secure very able men. If they did not know their business and make a good impression, it would reflect on the administration of the President. Furthermore, Cabinet members would have to be well versed in the business of their departments before coming to the Congress or make a poor showing. They would have to decide policy matters. If the President had not decided matters of policy on his level, the matters would have to be attended to before a Cabinet member came before the Congress. I think a great deal of value is secured by face-to-face meetings. Any arrangement where we have an opportunity of seeing the man who administers the laws we have passed, and where they have an opportunity of seeing and talking with us, will result in public good. It would give us an opportunity to let them know what we think about the way they are administering the law we had passed, the viewpoints of our constituents, by the questions asked. There is no easy way of bringing Members of Congress and Cabinet members together under our present arrangement.

Mr. VORYS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KEFAUVER. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. VORYS. I had occasion some time ago to talk to one of the Cabinet officers about this proposal and asked him what he thought of it. He thought it was very good. He said he thought it would eliminate from the service any official who was not able to talk and give a good accounting of his department, whether he could make a speech or not; anyone who was unable to express himself, man to man, before a group. He also said that if this became tradition it would probably result in more former Members of Congress being selected for such positions because of their ability to explain their ways on the floor. I pose this opinion for consideration in this matter. I feel sure the gentleman will agree with me that if one result was that our officials become more and more those who were former Members of Congress and who knew the ways of Congress, that might be a very good thing.

Mr. KEFAUVER. I will say to the gentleman I think any Cabinet member who really wanted to do his job well, who appreciates, as he would have to appreciate, that he can do a better job if he gets along with Congress, will be very happy to accept an invitation to come here to explain his department and any difficulties he may be having, and to give information on the floor of this House.

Mr. Speaker, this is not an innovation. It can be done without a constitutional amendment. It is not a party matter. It does not seek to place executive officials under undue domination. It does not seek to give them any dominance over us. It is a simple provision that would enable us to have a face-to-face discussion with the men who are enforcing the laws we make. It would result in much good to the Congress and much good to the members of the executive department and to the Nation.

More than 200 daily newspapers have carried favorable editorials supporting this plan. Here are three recent ones.

The New York Herald Tribune of January 8, 1947:

A QUESTION PERIOD IN CONGRESS

To many students of American Government, the separation between the legislative and executive branches has seemed too sharp. The chief check which Congress now has on how its will is carried out comes from formal written reports. These naturally stress what the executive thinks important and impressive, but not necessarily what the legislators may want to know. Congress' contact even with the Chief Executive is a one-way affair. The President sends messages, reports on the State of the Union. There is no equivalent of the British Parliament's question and answer period, when the legislators may ask directly what they want to know about the state of any particular affair.

ESTES KEFAUVER, Representative from Tennessee, reports that he is drafting a bill to permit Congress to summon any executive except the President to a regular question and answer period. His idea is that such sessions be held once a week or once in 2 weeks. The suggestion is the more interesting coming from the Democratic side, because a Republican Congress may be expected to have searching questions to put to the Democratic executive branch.

A regular period allowing for questioning pertinent to legislation immediately under consideration could not substitute entirely for time consuming public hearings called by congressional committees on projected bills. It might, however, preclude the necessity for official testimony retailed by committee-to-Congress session. It should speed, or else make unnecessary, lengthy congressional investigations undertaken on suspicion that Congress' will is not being carried out. It would be an interesting, perhaps fruitful, experiment which might appropriately be fitted into the current reorganization. Congress should give Mr. KEFAUVER'S idea really thoughtful consideration.

The Gazette, of Kalamazoo, Mich., January 12, 1947:

LEGISLATIVE AND EXECUTIVE

What might be described as an adaptation of a long-standing British custom is now being advocated by Representative KEFAUVER, of Tennessee, who says that he is preparing a bill which would permit the United States Congress to summon any Federal Government executive except the President to regular question-and-answer periods in the legislative branch. Mr. KEFAUVER, a Democrat, evidently is convinced that such an arrangement should prove particularly advantageous in the present governmental situation where the administration is in one party's hands and the control of Congress is held by the opposite party. "Now, more than ever, there has got to be some way of establishing communication between the executive and the legislative," the Tennessee lawmaker declares.

Such communication, of course, already exists in a limited degree. But it is very indirect and very formal, being carried on chiefly through written reports and Presidential messages and committee sessions. Representative KEFAUVER seems convinced that there would be much better understanding between the executive and legislative branches—and perceptibly better government, as a result—if responsible administrative leaders could be called before Congress at stated times to answer questions and present their views on issues of current importance. And it certainly does seem that an arrangement of this sort would have enough benefits to do more than offset whatever inconvenience it might cause to busy members of the administration. It would enable the lawmakers to get first-hand information from authoritative executive sources and it would also give the administrative officials an opportunity to present their own positions on controversial matters.

There is, to be sure, a fundamental difference between the American and the British governmental systems which makes the question-and-answer period more naturally applicable at London than at Washington. The British Premier is not an independently elected official, as the American President is. He is the parliamentary leader of his own political party, and his Cabinet is chosen from Parliament itself. The British, in other words, make no attempt at that sharp division between executive and legislative authority which is supposed to be one of the main characteristics of our American system. Yet, in spite of the official division we have here in the United States, the fact remains that a working understanding and even fairly close cooperation between the two branches of Government are often necessary in practice and are so recognized. It should be possible to gain the practical benefit of a plan like the one Mr. KEFAUVER advocates without really jeopardizing anything of value in our division-of-authority principle.

The Jefferson Republican, of Ranson, W. Va.:

BETTER GOVERNMENT

The proposal by Representative KEFAUVER, Tennessee Democrat, calling for periodic sessions between congressional groups and Executive appointees can have but the best consequences if enacted into law. One of the great weaknesses of the republican form of government has been the great 4-year chasm between the executive branch and the legislative branch.

As a result, Congress very often is completely in the dark as to legislative proposals emanating from the Executive offices, simply because no adequate machinery exists—as it exists under the English parliamentary system—to bring Cabinet officers and other members of the executive branch, short of the President, before Congress so that issues may be clarified, debatable points settled, and a fuller understanding reached in a face-to-face session without reliance upon the ponderous system of official messages and heavy state papers.

Under Mr. KEFAUVER'S scheme, Cabinet officers and others, short of the President himself, could be summoned before Congress for questioning. They would have the opportunity of explaining their positions relative to legislation. In all, Mr. KEFAUVER believes it would be helpful. In that belief, we concur.

It has become the vicious habit of late for various liberal literary spokesmen in the press to belittle the activities of the legislative branch of our Government. Members of Congress are held up to be a collection of boobs and fools who commit glaring and ludicrous errors of commission and omission. Yet, these same apologists for an overpoweringly powerful executive branch of the Government fail to explain that when Congress pulls a boner it is usually due to its ignorance of all the facts in the case, and that the executive branch hasn't been too anxious to make the facts public.

Mr. KEFAUVER'S proposed remedy might correct this situation.

(Mr. KEFAUVER asked and was granted permission to revise and extend his remarks and include a number of editorials and excerpts.)

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. TEAGUE (at the request of Mr. LUCAS) was granted permission to revise and extend his remarks in the RECORD on the veterans' question.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. SMITH of Wisconsin). Under previous order of the House, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. JENKINS] is recognized for 20 minutes.

IMMIGRATION

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I expect to devote the time which has been so graciously allotted to me to the discussion of a very important subject. That subject is immigration. The movement of people in all countries is the story of the development of civilization. Human beings and their personal wants and inclinations have been the main consideration of all governments. Probably no government in the history of the world has a more illustrious history from the standpoint of the movement of people than our country has. From Christopher Columbus to St. Augustine to Jamestown and Plymouth Rock is a very short time when we consider the whole history of man. And from these events up to the present time has taken only two or three centuries out of the many centuries since creation. Yet, in such short time, the greatest nation the world has ever seen has grown up to its present stature.

In our early history we welcomed all nationalities. But there came a time when we were required to protect ourselves against undesirables. It was then that the United States Government laid down the principle—probably for the first time in the history of the world—that it was an inherent right of every country to protect itself against the influx of other peoples. From this beginning we established the policy known as restrictive immigration. When this policy was first invoked we laid down literacy tests and health tests, and so forth. It soon developed that these tests did not provide sufficient restrictions. In spite of these tests over a million two hundred thousand immigrants came to the United States in 1907. Probably an equal number at least came to the country illegally, for in the early days the illegal entrants about equaled the legal entrants.

When the country really appreciated the impact of this great influx we began to make preparation for additional restrictions. I shall not engage your attention or enter into any detailed discussion of these preparations.

From 1921 to 1924 great strides were made from the legislative standpoint in this effort to restrict immigration. It was then that the policy of national origins was adopted. By national origins is meant that the population of the country in 1790 was surveyed to ascertain what percentage owed its origin to Great Britain and what percentage to Germany and France, and so forth. Quotas were fixed in accordance with this policy. An over-all figure of 153,000 was set as the number of immigrants to be admitted lawfully into the country. For instance, Great Britain and all of her provinces was given a quota of about 65,000. This was by far the largest quota given to any group. Since the establishment of this policy immigrants have been admitted in accordance with these quotas.

The immigration laws, however, have also admitted for temporary purposes unlimited numbers beyond the quota. This group, such as students, teachers, and visitors, is the group that has given our country much trouble because many of them have deliberately lost themselves in the population, and they and their offspring have populated the country.

In the early days of immigration enforcement we had here in the Government strong departments on immigration and naturalization. These departments functioned very efficiently. They were handling a completely new business, and it is only natural that by the trial and error process they developed some loopholes, but at the same time they improved the service greatly. Those were the days when those in authority were open and above board with their work and when it was possible for any Congressman to find out what was going on.

With the development of the country the work of these departments grew in importance and the personnel grew in number and in quality. Today we have an immigration force in the field of which we have a right to be proud. I wish the higher-ups were as dependable. We have a border patrol which has made a name for itself.

I should like to tell you a little story to show you how popular these organizations were when they were open and aboveboard. In our country President Coolidge is a synonym for economy. Yet when a bill of which I was the author and which provided for the expenditure of quite a large sum of money came up for consideration, Mr. Coolidge gave it his O. K. That legislation established a principle as to the Immigration Service and the border patrol which has later been accepted in all departments of the Government. I refer to the principle of automatic promotions. By reason of this legislation to which I refer, the Immigration Department was rehabilitated and the border patrol was reestablished and put on a sound basis. Mr. Coolidge recognized the importance of this work and gladly authorized the expenditure of what in those days was a tremendous sum of money. His judgment has been justified in many ways.

The Roosevelt administration brought to immigration a different attitude than that which had been assumed by any of its predecessors. Roosevelt when he was Governor of New York had steadily refused to cooperate with the immigration authorities and he and Secretary Perkins proceeded on a policy that to my mind has undermined the immigration laws and the administration of immigration laws until today it is almost impossible for any Congressman to find out anything about this governmental activity.

Time will not permit me to go into details with reference to these matters but I wish to say that a number of Congressmen have asked me whether there are any authentic figures with reference to how many persons are unlawfully in this country. I have never been able to find any answer for this question. In fact I am of the opinion that it has been the policy of the immigration authorities in the past 15 years to keep the public in the dark as much and as far as possible with reference to immigration matters. There is no question but that there are tens of thousands of persons in this country today who came here illegally. I have heard from well-versed students of immigration that there are hundreds of thousands of persons in this country who came here illegally. No doubt many of these could easily have been identified by the Government authorities if they had been inclined to do it. I have no doubt but that this situation has at least been passively encouraged by those in authority and by those whose responsibility it was to enforce the law.

I have no personal animosity toward any group or any nationality, and while I had the honor of being the author of a number of laws dealing with this great subject I never have been in favor of total restriction of immigration from any country from which our immigration has been coming regularly, and I would not today favor total restriction. But the conduct of those who have the responsibility of the immigration laws has been so flagrantly inefficient that a tremendous sentiment has grown up in this country in favor of total restriction. Those responsible for this sentiment have done a great injustice to the intelligent and deserving people of foreign countries who might wish to migrate to the United States.

I think that a great mistake was made when the Bureau of Immigration and Naturalization was abolished and when immigration was placed in the Department of Justice. Especially was this true when immigration was placed under the control of men who were totally out of sympathy with it and who were completely in favor of letting down the bars at every opportunity. In this respect I call upon the Attorney General to refrain from the customs and policies of Biddle and his gang. By background and by training the present Attorney General would not naturally proceed in the footsteps of Biddle and his group. I am afraid, however, that the policies of Biddle are still the policies of the office force of the present Attorney General. I hope that the present Attorney General realizes that the sentiment of the American people is in favor of sensible and efficient restriction. The people are not in favor of wholesale importation of all classes of people, many of whom will never espouse our ideals and many of whom will undermine our theory of government at every opportunity.

Another great blow was suffered by the cause of immigration when in the Reorganization Act by which the Congress was recently reorganized the Immigration Committee was done away with. While for the past few years under the Roosevelt-Perkins administration this committee did not function as I think it should to be in consonance with American sentiment, still it was an organized group of Congressmen in whose responsibility this great work was vested from a legislative standpoint. By the reorganization law immigration legislation is placed within the jurisdiction of the Judiciary Committee. I am in a way glad for this change in view of the very high standing of the Judiciary Committee. A subcommittee of that great committee has been appointed to deal with immigration legislation. I am sure that if that subcommittee will have time from its other important duties to function that it will function efficiently. I have the greatest respect for the membership of that subcommittee and I have privately and I do now publicly pledge to them my most loyal support. I hope that they will do away with the practice of the consideration of legislation for the relief of individual cases. Under the Republican administration we did not permit this practice but with the Roosevelt administration the practice developed. I did my part by opposing it most vigorously but my protests were of no avail. In the last few years at least hundreds of these private bills have been acted upon favorably with the result that many persons who were undesirable have been by congressional action given citizenship while no doubt there were many hundreds who were much more deserving who did not have the finances or the social standing with which to make legislative contact.

There is a constant and persistent influence at work in our country to violate the immigration laws in almost every conceivable way. No doubt this is due to the fact that in the State Department and in the Attorney General's office are many employees who have persistently infiltrated themselves into these Departments so as to encourage this practice of unlawful entry into the country. I do not charge this directly to the Secretary of State nor to the Attorney General except that I say that they could well afford to screen their personnel and to ascertain who in their Departments are undermining the law and in that way undermining the Government. I am sure that a careful screening would develop a large number who should be suspended from the service immediately.

Formerly the immigration authorities were diligent in their inspection of persons who came by boat to our shores. The law provided a severe penalty against steamship companies for bringing to our shores undesirable individuals. This was a proper policy for few if any aliens could come to our land except by boat. The steamship companies, in fear of the fine of $1,000 for each violation, soon found it profitable to obey the law. They still obey the law largely through fear of the penalty. The airplane companies are also bound to obey this law. However, they are now planning to change the law.

There is presently a committee of 11 members headed by Harry G. Tarrington, Director of International Activities Service, Foreign Office of the Civil Aeronautics Administration, making a survey of 19 major airports throughout the Nation with a view of simplifying entry requirements for passengers and freight. The general purpose may be well founded since there is, no doubt, useless red tape that has from time to time been put into effect by regulations, administrative orders, and other forms of directives, but:

The air lines, and apparently from press reports, also this committee, are taking this occasion to recommend what appears to be destruction of the purpose of our immigration laws. Some of the proposals of the air lines, approved at least in press interviews by this committee, must not be allowed to be enacted into law.

They propose that the word "immigrant" be substituted for the word "alien" in section 3 of the Immigration Act of February 5, 1917. To do this would deprive our Immigration Service of the power to refuse admission to this country of such classes as idiots, imbeciles, insane persons, chronic alcoholics, prostitutes, criminals, persons who advocate the overthrow by force or violence of the Government of the United States, and several other such classes of excluded aliens if they were asking to come here temporarily as nonimmigrants. Incidentally, nonimmigrants make up the major portion of our alien travel. This would appear also to deprive the Immigration Service of the right to deport such classes since they are now deported from this country, if found to be here, on the ground that they were a member of an excluded class at the time of entry. This Congress and especially the subcommittee of the Judiciary Committee of the House should give careful attention to this matter.

Another proposal is to put the permit issuing authority—consuls—and the examining authority—immigration inspectors—in the same department. In other words, transfer the immigration inspectors to the State Department. This would reduce our Immigration Service to a "rubber stamp" agency since obviously the State Department would never permit an official below the rank of consul—visa-issuing authority—to seriously question the acts of his superior. If this is to be done, we may as well do away with that part of the Immigration Service whose duties are the examination of aliens arriving in the United States, for its usefulness in excluding the undesirables will have vanished in thin air.

I again most respectfully call upon Tom Clark, the Attorney General, not to permit those in his Department who are inclined to let down the bar at every opportunity to put over the program of the airplane companies unless it can be justified from every angle. He should not give too much heed to the clamor of any special-interest group.

In summary, the air lines propose that the responsibility for predetermining an alien's right to apply for admission to the United States rests solely with the embassies and consulates. Under present laws and regulations nonimmigrant or passport visas are valid in most instances for a period of 1 year. Do they want us to welcome a bank robber with open arms to our country if he got a visa in January and did not rob the bank until February, or the person who became afflicted with a loathsome and contagious disease after getting his visa from a consul? Many of the cases where the Immigration Service refuses admission of aliens to the United States are from instances originating or their origin ascertained after consular officials had already granted them a visa. To destroy the right of immigration officers to exclude nonimmigrants in possession of a visa would let many undesirable aliens into the United States who are not now eligible for admission regardless of whether or not they have a visa.

In this connection the subject of seamen has been carefully avoided since the proposals are presented by air lines, but the proposed revision would also appear to effect seamen. Does anyone believe for one minute that a United States consul examines all of the crew members of such vessels as the Queen Mary, the Queen Elizabeth, and, in fact, all of the ships coming to our ports? Certainly not. For a fee he places a visa stamp on the crew list. The only examination given these people by the Government of the United States is by immigration officers. These proposals would appear to tie the hands of the immigration officer completely from two standpoints. First, the seaman would have a visa since the crew list of foreign ships are required to be visaed. Second, by changing the word "alien" to "immigrant," the exclusion of this class would be impossible under section 3 of the Immigration Act of 1917 because seamen are one of the classes of nonimmigrants, and if the act applied only to immigrants they could not be examined with reference to all of these basic reasons for exclusion from admission to the United States.

The air lines point out in the prologue of their agenda that the laws and regulations not only of the United States but throughout the world should be streamlined and made more uniform both as to the text and application, in order to avoid continued vexatious and expensive delays in the transportation of passengers and cargo by air. Yet, their recommendations do not appear to have the purpose of eliminating the unessential work which really would speed up travel, but rather to relieve the transportation companies of all penalties and obligations under the immigration laws.

They propose, at the top of page 8 in their agenda, that transportation companies be accorded the opportunity to correct manifest errors upon arrival in the United States, and at the same time the $10 fine for manifest errors be eliminated. Passenger manifests in compliance with the laws of Congress are necessarily rather long since quite a bit of information is essential. To present these manifests to the transportation lines for correction of errors after passengers have arrived in the United States instead of immigration inspectors correcting them at the time of examination of the passengers certainly would not expedite or in any way facilitate the entry of their passengers.

The air lines further propose that sufficient numbers of immigration inspectors be assigned to designated ports of entry to furnish all year 24-hour-a-day coverage for inspection and clearance of international passengers, and that the transportation companies not be responsible for the payment of overtime for aircraft arriving at designated ports of entry regardless of arrival time, whether on, or behind schedule; and that unscheduled aircraft which arrive at designated ports of entry at a time when immigration inspectors are on duty not be subject to overtime payment. At the present time we are making every possible effort to reduce the Government expenditures and reduce the number of Federal employees to the bare essentials to carry on the necessary functions of Government. To place immigration inspectors 24 hours a day every day in the year at all international airports would enormously increase the number of immigration inspectors required. In Miami, Fla., alone there are four approved international airports. The greater volume of travel comes through the Thirty-sixth Airport. I was informed in that office that the approved seaplane base at Dinner Key frequently did not have an international arrival for a week or more at a time, and that arrivals at night hours are very irregular at two of the other approved airports. If we followed the recommendation of these air lines we would have to place immigration inspectors at these places on a 24-hour basis, 365 days a year, to twiddle their thumbs the great majority of their time, in order to save the transportation company from having to pay an inspector who has performed his tour of duty one-half day's pay for each 2 hours of work when called out during hours after 5 p. m. and before 8 a. m., or 2 days' pay on Sundays or holidays.

Our laws at the present time provide for absolutely free immigration inspections of scheduled planes which arrive within an hour of their scheduled time, regardless of the day or night, Sunday or holiday, with no charge whatsoever for inspection by the Immigration Service. For those that are not scheduled, they may easily avoid overtime payments by arriving between the hours of 8 a. m. and 5 p. m. on weekdays. I see no reason that the Government should employ a greater number of immigration inspectors in those instances where the law provides that such charges may be made.

There are, as I said before, some proposals that appear to be sound, but they may be put into effect without legislation. For instance, the air lines ask why it takes 8 weeks to get a decision on an appeal of an excluded alien. The laws now provide that when at the time of arrival an alien is believed to be inadmissible to the United States he shall be held for a hearing before a board of special inquiry composed of three members. If he is excluded by this board and does not appeal, he should be immediately deported. If he does appeal, the record in his case is transcribed and forwarded to the Board of Immigration Appeals for final decision. I am told that the record in these cases is reviewed first by the officer in charge of the port, then it is forwarded to the office of the district director of immigration where it is again reviewed; it is then forwarded to the office of the Commissioner of Immigration in Philadelphia, where it is again reviewed; it is then forwarded to the Board of Immigration Appeals in Washington, where it is again reviewed and a final decision made. No wonder the alien waits 8 weeks and the transportation companies complain about detention charges. Congress did not pass any law requiring all that review, and they do not need to change any laws to eliminate it.

Our laws regulating immigration are all right—all we need is sensible enforcement of them.

I can say the same for the border patrolmen. This department has improved its efficiency greatly, and is manned by men of courage and ability. Their work during the war in ferreting out undesirable and alien enemies was of a very high order. It is rumored that it is the purpose of those in high authority to turn over the work of the border patrol to the FBI. While I have great regard for the FBI, I hope that this rumored plan will not be effectuated. The FBI primarily and almost exclusively is intended to deal with lawbreakers and criminals of all kinds. The great bulk of the people who come to our country are not criminals. One need only to go to one of our ports of entry, New York or Miami, and watch the cargo of passengers disembark and he will be convinced that very few of the thousands who travel to and from our country are criminals. But practically every one of them must pass inspection by our custom officers and our immigration officers and our health authorities. This is not the work of the FBI. It is a work that has been well done heretofore. Of course I would admit that any such an expansion system can constantly be improved. I advocate that, but I advocate care in accepting suggestions on these matters from persons or sources that have a financial gain in sight or that have in mind undermining the immigration laws of our land.

LEGISLATION TO MEET POSTAL DEFICIT

Mr. REES. Mr. Speaker, we have been concerned with the mounting deficit of the Post Office Department, which for the fiscal year 1948 is estimated to be over $287,000,000. Unless this deficit is taken care of through the Post Office Department, it will, of course, be a charge against the Federal Treasury and against the taxpayers of this country.

The Post Office Department was requested to present specific recommendations to the Congress for rates in the various classes of mail which would bring revenues of the Post Office Department up to the level of the cost of operation.

The Post Office Department has presented certain schedules which they estimate will improve the fiscal picture of the Post Office Department. If the present 3-cent rate is extended and all of their recommendations placed in effect, there would still be some question as to whether there would be sufficient funds to meet the deficit for the fiscal year 1948. However, since these are the best estimates and suggested rates which the Post Office Department can present, I have prepared a bill in line with the proposal of the Post Office Department and the Committee on Post Office and Civil Service will hold hearings on the proposed legislation so that whatever legislation is adopted by this Congress, it may become effective before the beginning of the next fiscal year.

I believe it should be emphasized that in addition to increases in rates, in order to bring the fiscal status of the Post Office Department into balance, we must also increase the efficiency of the postal operation. There should be revision of procedures where they would reduce cost and still maintain the best possible service. Since nearly 80 percent of the expenditures of the Post Office Department is for personnel, it is reasonable that we should expect to increase the efficiency of the postal operations and improve personnel utilization by revised procedures and by taking advantage of new techniques.

I believe that increased efficiency can be brought about through effective administration. A savings in personnel utilization would make a savings of such degree as to take care of a considerable amount of the deficiency in the Post Office Department. I believe that with added efficiency and utilization of personnel, together with the rates included in the legislation I have submitted, there should be sufficient funds to place the Post Office Department on a basis where it will not need to charge the Federal Treasury with funds, in order to carry on its services.

The bill I have introduced includes provisions which will continue the wartime increases on postal rates, which without such provisions, would cease to be in effect July 1 of this year. It is therefore necessary that action on this legislation be expedited so that, first, the wartime rates will continue in effect after July 1 and, second, that the Post Office Department will have the benefit of the additional revenue during the entire fiscal year of 1948.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under the previous order of the House, the gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. MERROW] is recognized for 30 minutes.

REPORT BY CONGRESSMAN CHESTER E. MERROW ON THE FIRST GENERAL CONFERENCE OF THE UNITED NATIONS EDUCATIONAL, SCIENTIFIC, AND CULTURAL ORGANIZATION HELD IN PARIS

Mr. MERROW. Mr. Speaker, it was my honor and privilege to serve as one of the congressional advisers to the American delegation of the first general conference of the United Nations Educational, Scientific, and Cultural Organization held in Paris late last year. At that meeting I had the opportunity to observe UNESCO—to employ its short title—come into active existence, with new officers, a proposed budget, and a program of action for the current year. I am going to report to the House on the activities of the Paris Conference and to emphasize their significance, not only for the United States but for the entire world. I will preface the details of this report with a prediction and a short summary of the purposes of the new organization.

A PREDICTION

The prediction is first. In my opinion—and I am certain that time will prove me correct—the organization of UNESCO has set in motion a trend toward better world understanding and mutual helpfulness. This movement, if given the realistic and enthusiastic support of the more fortunate nations, will grow constantly in effectiveness. In the near future UNESCO can and will become one of the most important of the specialized agencies of the United Nations, assisting immeasurably in man's struggle to achieve an enduring peace.

PURPOSES OF UNESCO

UNESCO's aims can be realized if mankind has the determination to realize them.

The purpose of the Organization—

In the words of the constitution—is to contribute to peace and security by promoting collaboration among the nations through education, science, and culture in order to further universal respect for justice, for the rule of law, and for the human rights and fundamental freedoms which are affirmed for the peoples of the world, without distinction of race, sex, language, or religion, by the Charter of the United Nations.

When this has been achieved, when men everywhere have acquired the habit and the means of working and thinking together, then it will be possible to consider peace as something more than a period between battles. Then, and then only, will the nations of this world be able to afford, in the words of the old Negro spiritual, to "study war no more."

The early evidences of such a change in international habits are hard to pin down and difficult to speak about realistically; to stress them while the old habits of political maneuvering are so clearly in the saddle is to invite the deserved criticism of wishful interpretation. Even at the UNESCO meetings in Paris the new direction in thinking was not always apparent. There, as at every international conference, narrow interests loomed large in much of the discussion. Yet the basic aims of the Conference had an amazingly genuine acceptance among the representatives. They bargained, it is true, over immediate tactics, but my experience at the Conference convinced me of their over-all sincerity and their tense awareness of the opportunities for mutually profitable world cooperation in science, education, and cultural affairs. The proof rests in their reaffirmation of UNESCO's purposes and in the steps outlined for the first phase of achievement.

A YEAR OF PREPARATION FOR THE PARIS CONFERENCE

The UNESCO Conference in Paris extended from November 19 to December 10, 1946. In these few weeks a year of preparatory work was brought to a focus. The planning was begun at the UNESCO Constitutional Drafting Conference that met in London in November 1945. I attended this Conference as a delegate and on November 26, 1945, made a report on its conclusions to the House. I wish to reemphasize that the delegates of the 44 nations who formulated the constitution of UNESCO in 1945 thought clearly and planned well. The General Conference of 1946 fulfilled every reasonable expectation of a modest and practical beginning for the new world educational organization.

That so much has been accomplished in such a short period of time is in my opinion due to two factors: first, the explicit provisions of the UNESCO constitution; and, second, the labors of the many specialists from the United States and other countries who worked on the provisional programs through 1946.

UNESCO'S CONSTITUTION

Support for UNESCO'S general aims developed steadily throughout the year. There was widespread agreement on their importance. The necessity for such an organization grows naturally out of the aims and problems of the United Nations. If the peoples of the world are to be united in friendly cooperation then the causes of the fear and suspicion which now separate them must be uprooted and destroyed. The deep-seated prejudice and fear; the festering suspicions, bigotries and hatreds; the crippling ignorance and the lack of educational means, which wall mankind off into warring cliques—these are still strangling the growth of a friendly society of nations. To eradicate them and minimize their effects calls for a concerted effort to open the minds of individual men everywhere to tolerance and truth. UNESCO is organized to achieve these ends. In the words of the preamble to its constitution:

Ignorance of each other's ways and lives has been a common cause, throughout the history of mankind, of that suspicion and mistrust between peoples of the world through which their differences have all too often broken into war.

* * * the great and terrible war which has now ended was a war made possible by the denial of the democratic principles of the dignity, equality, and mutual respect of men, and by the propagation, in their place, through ignorance and prejudice, of the doctrine of the inequality of men and races.

* * * the wide diffusion of culture and the education of humanity for justice and liberty and peace are indispensable to the dignity of men and constitute a sacred duty which all nations must fulfill in a spirit of mutual assistance and concern.

These general propositions are summed up in UNESCO's central axiom "that, since wars begin in the minds of men, it is in the minds of men that the defenses of peace must be constructed."

THE ORGANS OF UNESCO

UNESCO's remarkable constitution calls for an organizational structure that is simple and flexible. A General Conference of up to five delegates from each member state will meet annually to perform the legislative functions for the Organization. The General Conference bears the same relation to UNESCO as the General Assembly bears to the United Nations or this Congress to the United States. The UNESCO constitution provides for an Executive Board of 18 members, elected by the General Conference from among the delegates of the member states. The third organ of UNESCO is a Secretariat, or permanent staff, which will be in constant session. The Secretariat will be under a Director General.

In addition to the above, there will be various joint committees which will effect direct cooperation between UNESCO and the other intergovernmental agencies and with private international organizations which have similar or related ends in view. Member states may mesh their domestic and regional programs into the master plan of UNESCO as they see fit. This is an important consideration for the United States, which has maintained a mutually profitable information and cultural relations program with the other American Republics since 1940.

CONGRESS APPROVES UNESCO CONSTITUTION

Late in January 1946, I introduced in the House, and Senator MURRAY in the Senate, a joint resolution (H. J. Res. 305) authorizing United States participation in UNESCO. The House passed the joint resolution on May 23, 1946, and the Senate approved an amended version on July 17, 1946. A conference committee recommended the Senate version, and both Houses acted in accordance with its report. President Truman signed the measure—Public Law 565—on July 30, 1946.

THE NATIONAL COMMISSION

The amended measure requires the creation of a National Commission on Educational, Scientific, and Cultural Cooperation not to exceed 100 members. This body was organized in the manner prescribed by the law and held its first meetings in September 1946. Its relationship with the international organization is specified in the following paragraphs taken from article VII of UNESCO's constitution:

Each member state shall make such arrangements as suit its particular conditions for the purpose of associating its principal bodies interested in educational, scientific, and cultural matters with the work of the organization, preferably by the formation of a National Commission broadly representative of the Government and such bodies.

National Commissions or national cooperating bodies, where they exist, shall act in an advisory capacity to their respective delegations to the General Conference and to their Governments in matters relating to the Organization and shall function as agencies of liaison in all matters of interest to it.

The Organization may, on the request of a member state, delegate, either temporarily or permanently, a member of its Secretariat to serve on the National Commission of that state, in order to assist in the development of its work.

The United States National Commission gave direct and valuable aid to the American delegation to the General Conference in Paris. But that is only one part of its significant contributions. In itself, as an organization, it represents a great advance in national unity, for it is the first formal body to serve as a focal center for the intellectual and cultural life of the United States. In a plenary meeting of the General Conference in Paris, Assistant Secretary of State Benton summed up the significance of the National Commission in these words:

[It] is a body unique in American history. It unites in one assembly spokesmen of the arts, sciences, and learned professions; of the educational system at all levels; of radio, motion pictures, and the press; of the educational interests of labor and agriculture, and of religious bodies; and of many other American groups that are now working for the establishment of peace. * * * My nine associates, appointed by President Truman to our delegation here, are all of them members of the United States Commission for UNESCO.

In the short period of its operations the National Commission has demonstrated the efficiency of combined action and underscored the necessity for the united attack upon threats to the peace which brought UNESCO into being.

THE PREPARATORY COMMISSION

The London Conference in 1945 set up a Preparatory Commission to formulate an agenda for the first General Conference in Paris. The Commission under the terms of a separate instrument signed by 41 nations at the end of the Conference consisted of one representative from each of the signatory governments. From these an executive committee of 15 members and an executive secretary were elected. A provisional secretariat was assembled and a system of technical subcommittees organized. As outlined in the instrument, the Commission's duties were, first, to convoke the first session of the General Conference and arrange for the transfer of activities from London to Paris; second, to prepare the provisional agenda for the first session of the General Conference and make all proper and necessary recommendations; third, to prepare plans for the budget of the Organization; and, fourth, to "provide without delay for immediate action on urgent needs of educational, scientific, and cultural reconstruction in devastated countries."

The Preparatory Commission held two brief meetings immediately after the London Conference to elect its officers and to draft rules of procedure. Sir Alfred Zimmern was chosen executive secretary. His prolonged illness made a replacement necessary, however, and the choice fell to Dr. Julian Huxley, also of Great Britain. The Commission held brief sessions in January and February 1946. Six sections of the Secretariat with advisory subcommittees were organized to evaluate the numerous proposals for the agenda of the first General Conference. These groups considered programs on, first, education; second, natural sciences; third, libraries and special projects; fourth, social sciences; fifth, media of mass communication; and, sixth, the creative arts.

No fewer than 147 proposals were cleared by the subcommittees and gathered together by the temporary Secretariat into a report known as Document 51. It was the analysis of this document, item by item, that constituted the major part of the Preparatory Commission's task in its fifth and most extended session held in London, July 5 to July 12, 1946. This report, as revised by the Preparatory Commission and its executive committee, comprised the provisional program submitted to the General Conference in Paris. A separate report was submitted to the Conference by the Technical Subcommittee on Reconstruction and Rehabilitation. The Preparatory Commission as a whole also presented a report on administrative and financial arrangements, legal questions, and external relations.

WAR AND THE INDIVIDUAL MIND

Throughout the preparations for the General Conference and throughout the Paris meetings there was one unifying concept: that the breeding ground of war is in the human mind. Wars are an aggregate sickness of the human spirit. They are not a part of the mutation and change of normal growth. They closely resemble a cancer of the social body. As in that malignant disease of the human body some of the individual cells reverse their life-giving function. They multiply, absorb or starve the healthy tissues and eat at the vital organs of first a nation, then a group of nations, and finally the whole of world society. If the blight spreads unchecked, eventually there comes a point at which peace-minded peoples in self-preservation must fight back by entering the armed conflict. The result is a world war with millions dead, and a maimed, if not destroyed, civilization.

In the past decade we have had an opportunity to observe the clinical details. The symptoms we are now able to recognize are those of personal and national paranoia; of hatred engendered by economic maladjustment; of arrogant ignorance and crippling illiteracy; of savagely attacked racial minorities; of bigotry and ruthless ambition in self-styled, self-elected leaders and their mob-minded followers.

We have no need of a psychologist or a philosopher to interpret the rudimentary meaning of UNESCO's constitution. Wars do "begin in the minds of men" and for the safety of our Nation we must cooperate with other governments to do what we can to erect "the defenses of the peace" in the minds of men. Medical science has not yet found the cure for cancer. It may be that we have found a way, a simple and human way, to eliminate the causes of war.

Of course the total structure of the peace will not rise without additional and broader activities than those of UNESCO. But in the totality of effort the informed conscience of the individual citizen must play a crucial and determining role. It is this building up of the peace in terms of the individual mind that is the central purpose and function of UNESCO. Former Secretary of State Byrnes summed up this aspect of the general program when he said:

I can conceive of no more important endeavor than to make the mind of man a constructive force for peace. That effort is fundamental to the success of the United Nations organization. We realize that world peace can be maintained only by the united efforts of all peoples. Men work together most effectively when they have learned to think together and to feel together. Without common knowledge, common agreement is difficult or impossible. The discovery of atomic energy has made the task of the United Nations Educational, Scientific, and Cultural Organization an even more imperative one. In a world where nations may arm themselves with weapons against which there is no physical defense, basic security lies in the creation of mutual trust and confidence among peoples of the world. If UNESCO can bring that goal nearer by one step, it deserves our prompt and wholehearted participation.

PARIS

Although this high seriousness provided the central theme for the meetings of the General Conference in Paris, it must be admitted the Government of France went to considerable pains to make the stay of the delegates a pleasant experience. The members of the United States delegation have every reason to be grateful for the thoughtfulness of their host. There were shortages of food, coal, clothing, and other basic necessities of life in Paris, but it was still the beautiful city so well known to Americans. It seemed miraculous that this great capital in Europe had escaped the devastation that other such cities suffered in England and the Continent.

The Conference itself took place in the Hotel Majestic, now known as UNESCO House. This well-known hotel has been made available by the French Government as the headquarters of this specialized agency of the United Nations.

The American delegation stayed in the Hotel Crillon, on the famous Place de la Concorde. Delegation meetings were held in the Eagle Room of that hotel. In this room, President Wilson presided over representatives of the major powers, following the last war, in drafting the Covenant for the League of Nations.

THE SORBONNE

The Conference wa formally opened in the amphitheater of the Sorbonne of the University of Paris. It was a stirring session, with the most distinguished leaders and intellectuals of France present along with the delegates from the many countries represented at the UNESCO Conference. Speeches were given by the provisional president, M. Bidault, the French Minister of Education, and several other distinguished leaders. In the University of Paris, which since the Middle Ages has been a world center of intellectual endeavor, delegates were well aware of the opportunity that was presented them, as well as the many difficult problems that we must have to face and solve to achieve the objective contained in the constitution of UNESCO.

STATES REPRESENTED AT THE CONFERENCE

As I have noted earlier in this report, the general sessions of the Conference at UNESCO House were marked from the first hours by an energetic belief on the part of the delegates that UNESCO has a major contribution to make to world peace. The broad support backing that belief is certain to make UNESCO a powerful factor in world affairs. Thirty governments have approved UNESCO's constitution and deposited instruments of acceptance with the British Government. These member states sent representatives to Paris and held voting power in the General Conference. They were Australia, Belgium, Bolivia, Brazil, Canada, China, Czechoslovakia, Denmark, Dominican Republic, Ecuador, Egypt, France, Greece, Haiti, India, Lebanon, Mexico, Netherlands, New Zealand, Norway, Peru, Philippines, Poland, Saudi Arabia, Syria, Turkey, United Kingdom, Union of South Africa, United States, Venezuela.

In addition 18 countries sent observers to the Conference. These representatives held no voting power, but their views were heard by the Conference, as notably in the address delivered at a plenary meeting by Mr. Ribnikar, the representative of Yugoslavia. The countries sending observers were: Argentina, Chile, Colombia, Costa Rica, Cuba, Guatemala, Iceland, Iraq, Lybia, Luxemburg, Nicaragua, Panama, Salvador, Sweden, Paraguay, Switzerland, Uruguay, Yugoslavia.

RUSSIA ABSENT

Russia was the only major power without representation at the Conference. Her absence was deeply regretted by the delegates. It was held generally that one of UNESCO's primary tasks will be to win the support of the Soviet Government and through that Government the active participation of the Soviet peoples. Through its present membership UNESCO can achieve great and useful ends. Many believe, however, that the organization will not be able to realize its full potentialities until the Soviet Union joins constructively in the work. A hopeful interpretation has been placed upon the absence of an official declaration from Moscow and upon the fact that the proceedings at Paris were ignored by the Communist press. It has been pointed out that the Soviet Union has thus no commitments and can move freely toward membership at a later date.

CONFERENCE HARMONIOUS

The Conference, on the whole, was harmonious and fruitful. The differences were mainly those of emphasis. There were delegates from some countries, such as the United States, the United Kingdom, the Scandinavian countries, the British Commonwealth, and the other American republics, who felt that they could begin immediately to build the defenses of peace in the minds of men. But there were also representatives from the devastated countries, such as China, France, the Philippine Republic, Belgium, Czechoslovakia, Yugoslavia, Poland, and Greece, who face the task of rebuilding and reconstructing their educational, scientific, and cultural institutions before they would have the basis to achieve the objectives of UNESCO.

THE AMERICAN DELEGATION

The American delegation to the UNESCO Conference numbered 40. It was smaller than the French and British delegations, but a representative group of distinguished men and women competent in the fields of education, science, culture, and press, radio, and motion pictures. The head of the delegation was Mr. William Benton, Assistant Secretary of State. The deputy head of the delegation was Mr. Archibald MacLeish, former Assistant Secretary of State and Librarian of Congress. The other three delegates were Mrs. Anne O'Hare McCormick, of the New York Times; Dr. Arthur Compton, chancelor of Washington University, St. Louis; and Dr. George Stoddard, president of the University of Illinois. The alternate delegates were Mr. Chester Bowles, former Administrator, Office of Price Administration; Dr. Milton S. Eisenhower, president of Kansas State College; Dr. Charles Johnson, president of Fisk University; and Dr. George Shuster, president of Hunter College.

In addition to the delegates and the alternates, there were a number of advisers and technical consultants. The American delegation worked hard and efficiently. It usually met as a group each morning and each evening. The morning session was devoted to consideration of questions and problems that would arise in Commission or General Conference meetings that day, while the evening session was used to learn from the various members of the delegation, sitting on the different committees, the developments of the day, and to plan strategy for the next sessions.

ORGANIZATION OF THE CONFERENCE

The Conference was quickly organized, with M. Blum as the president of the General Conference. Delegates of the United States, the United Kingdom, Brazil, China, South Africa, the Philippine Republic, and Saudi Arabia were elected as vice presidents. The Executive Board of 18 members was constituted. The Conference set up three major commissions—the Program Commission, the Reconstruction and Rehabilitation Commission, and the Administrative and Financial Commission. The Secretariat of the Preparatory Commission of UNESCO, made up of some 376 specialists from some 28 different countries, was organized to service the delegates in their work.

DIRECTOR GENERAL

The Conference elected Dr. Julian Huxley, of Great Britain, as the Director General, to serve for the next 2 years. Dr. Walter Laves, of the United States, is the Deputy Director General. The Director General and his staff, under the guidance of the Executive Board, will develop and implement the projects and programs agreed upon by the General Conference of UNESCO.

THE WORK OF THE GENERAL CONFERENCE

The first session of the General Conference of UNESCO at Paris commenced its deliberations with certain invaluable advantages. Summarized briefly, these were:

First. A carefully assembled and documented provisional program submitted by the Preparatory Commission. It was the primary task of the Conference to review and select from these projects and to formulate an official program.

Second. A body of ideas and information from earlier organizations, notably the Institute of Intellectual Cooperation of the League of Nations; the Council of Allied Ministers of Education, which was organized during the war years in London; and the Joint UNRRA-UNESCO Committee set up in 1946.

Third. The prospect of active cooperation from private organizations with international membership.

Fourth. The advice and experience of the delegates from governments operating regional and world programs in cultural relations, such as the Office of International Information and Cultural Affairs of our Department of State.

THE PROGRAM COMMISSION

The Program Commission of the Conference established six subcommissions, one for each of the specialized fields of activity. The final reports of these six groups were reviewed by a drafting committee and submitted, along with a commentary by the chairman, Mr. Archibald MacLeish, to the General Conference. They were adopted with minor changes.

The total program adopted by the conference displays at first glance a somewhat bewildering complexity. Perhaps more than 100 potential projects emerged in the final report, a tremendous bite for an untried organization. Several factors, however, should be kept in mind when judging this proposed program. First, a start must be made, or at least planned for, in each of the fields of UNESCO's interests, and the range here takes in the whole of present-day cultural and scientific activity. Second, limitations of budget and time will center the most energetic promotion upon a few pilot projects rather than upon the whole of the adopted program. Third, the cumulative experience and judgment of the Director General and the executive board will determine the most profitable division between immediate and long-term emphasis.

A brief summary of the typical projects outlined by the program commission will indicate the general nature of UNESCO's obligations in 1947.

THE PROPOSALS ON EDUCATION

The most interesting project in the educational section of the program is the long-range plan for universal education. The UNESCO Secretariat, aided by a panel of experts, will begin in 1947 to assist in establishing a minimum fundamental education for all persons throughout the world. As a part of that effort, a start will be made on the collection of data on adult education from the member states. The central staff will help in providing suitable materials—books, pictures, films, and radio scripts. Assistance will be sought in collateral fields such as library services and the social sciences. As the program develops, follow-up work will carry the new skills of reading and writing into everyday life and build a growing recognition of international problems.

A second major project will be a comprehensive program for the improvement of textbooks and related teaching materials with the aim of aiding international understanding. As a first step the member states will be asked to send to the Secretariat in 1947 full sets of their most commonly used textbooks in history, geography, civics, and similar subjects. With the assistance of the national commissions and other national bodies, the Secretariat will arrange for the study of these materials and will make a report to the next general conference in Mexico City. The voluntary nature of this activity should be emphasized. UNESCO has neither the power nor the desire to interfere in any national system of education. Article I, section 3, of its constitution specifically forbids such interference:

> With a view to preserving the independence, integrity, and fruitful diversity of the cultures and educational systems of the states, members of this organization, the organization is prohibited from intervening in matters which are essentially within their domestic jurisdiction.

MASS COMMUNICATIONS

The mass communications program for 1947 gives first priority to rehabilitation. The first and most pressing measure for UNESCO will be the appointment of three commissions on immediate technical needs, one each for films, radio, and press. Their job will be to examine the requirements of those countries, particularly in Europe and the Far East, where the war has caused serious loss of equipment or personnel, or where rehabilitation and reconstruction are affected by inadequate technical knowledge and facilities. They will examine the present needs for raw materials, equipment and trained personnel. Their inquiries will cover the supply of raw film stock, pulp and paper; film cameras and projectors; radio transmitting and receiving apparatus; printing machinery and type. The three commissions are required to present their reports within 6 months. Their recommendations will concern immediate measures for correcting the deficiencies and plans for further supply and technical improvement.

As a parallel project a technical training scheme is also given top priority. The secretariat will facilitate through fellowships, the pooling of experience by an international exchange of instructors and trainees.

In the long-term planning for mass communications, two projects have considerable importance. UNESCO will cooperate with the Freedom of Information Subcommission of the United Nations Commission on Human Rights in the preparation of a report on the obstacles to the free flow of information and ideas. The report will itemize world facilities for the spread of information and discuss the restrictions, suppressions, and distortions of information caused by any condition or influence. Also in cooperation with the United Nations, UNESCO will explore the possibilities of creating a world-wide broadcasting network. A committee of experts will be appointed to study proposals relating to this project.

The American delegates were especially interested in the proposals concerning the media of mass communication. Their view that the media are ideally suited to UNESCO's purposes had gratifying support at the Conference.

THE NATURAL SCIENCES

The primary project in the field of the natural sciences is a concerted attack upon the problem of satisfactory living in the equatorial forest zone, a world area with almost limitless possibilities of development. As a concrete beginning UNESCO will take over the coordination of the various researches by many nations in the great Amazonian forest region with a view to establishing an International Institute of the Hylean Amazon at Para, Brazil. The Secretariat is directed to consult with Brazil, Colombia, Bolivia, Ecuador, Peru, Venezuela, France, Great Britain, the Netherlands, and the United States of America with the purpose of setting up at once an International Scientific Commission. The Commission will investigate all aspects of the proposal on the spot and frame a draft agreement of cooperation.

A similar project relates to the study of undernourished populations. UNESCO will institute a group of field teams in nutritional science and food technology. They will consist of scientists of high quality and will operate where possible from existing laboratories, but will be made fully mobile by special transportation aids. Teams will be formed immediately for India, the Hylean Amazon, China, and as soon as conditions permit, for Africa.

The Secretariat also will explore the possibilities for establishing new international laboratories, observatories, and stock rooms for pure substances, new materials, and radioactive isotopes.

SOCIAL SCIENCES, PHILOSOPHY, AND THE HUMANITIES

In the field of the social sciences the most striking project is that of a study of the tensions crucial to peace. This study will examine three interconnected groups of world problems—those relating to nationalism and internationalism, those relating to population, and those relating to technological progress. The whole battery of specialists in political science, economics, sociology, anthropology, human geography, and psychology will be brought to bear upon every aspect of these problems. The purpose will be to devise and develop new instruments and methods for estimating these tensions, and always with the direct object of practical action. An additional project will be the preparation of a world inventory of research resources in the social sciences, primarily to assist the operations of UNESCO.

In the field of philosophy the Secretariat is directed to cooperate with the UN Commission on Human Rights in organizing an international conference to clarify the principal basis to a modern declaration of the rights of men. In the humanistic studies the Secretariat will explore basic principles and inquire into the place that studies of the past should occupy in present-day education.

LIBRARIES AND MUSEUMS

The libraries and museums of the world constitute tested and active channels of education and information. UNESCO's purpose is to improve them generally and to coordinate their efforts toward world understanding. UNESCO will promote the creation of new public circulating and reference libraries and museums for adults and children. The Secretariat will encourage free access to all museums, sites, and collections and will stimulate special scientific, cultural, and educational activities for adults and children in the public libraries and museums throughout the world.

The rehabilitation of libraries, museums, and archives will be an immediate consideration. The Secretariat will help in the rehabilitation, protection, and restoration of sites, museums, collections, and documents affected by the war. It will make an inventory of the needs, especially in those areas where the facilities are still in danger and require urgent attention.

UNESCO will also establish an international clearing house for publications. It will attempt to fill in the serious gaps in public collections and encourage the creation of a national lending library in each country to be part of an international lending system serviced by UNESCO.

THE CREATIVE ARTS

The general conference at Paris agreed that UNESCO should study the role of the creative arts at all levels including professional schools. Information services, a central exchange for artistic products and persons and international festivals and conferences will be organized. The Secretariat will help artists obtain tools, methods, and materials. It will initiate the recording of folklore and the preservation of native arts and culture.

To protect the artist at his proper work, the subcommission adopted a resolution suggesting that UNESCO, acting on the behalf of the peoples of all nations, "take such measures as are open to it under its Constitution to protect and defend the freedom of the artist wherever it is put in danger."

In the field of literature the secretariat will set up a translation office that will maintain an international literary pool to supply magazines and newspapers with material for publication. In the field of the theater, which includes the ballet and opera, UNESCO will call a meeting of experts to found an International Theatrical Institution independent of UNESCO and supported by private national branches and centers.

All these projects I have been describing were submitted by the six program subcommissions and approved in principle by the General Conference. There are many more of them. Viewed as a whole they give, I believe, a picture of the tremendous range—and therefore possibilities—of UNESCO's fields of action. The number of these projects which will be considered crucial and realizable for 1947 will depend upon UNESCO's budget and upon the extent of reconstruction and rehabilitation activities.

COMMISSION ON RECONSTRUCTION AND REHABILITATION

The work of the Commission on Reconstruction and Rehabilitation comprises perhaps the most immediately important effort of the General Conference. The Commission had as the basis of its deliberations an exhaustive report prepared by the Preparatory Commission's special technical subcommittee on reconstruction and rehabilitation.

The Commission approved the following activities:

First. UNESCO will serve as the central agency in an extensive fund-raising campaign among private relief groups and agencies. It will formulate relief proposals, secure contributions, make arrangements to distribute supplies, and stimulate the National Commissions and voluntary organizations to cooperate in these activities. The reconstruction and rehabilitation section of the secretariat has begun to carry out these objectives. It has launched a drive for $100,000,000 in goods and money for the reconstruction and rehabilitation of schools, libraries, laboratories, and museums devastated by the war.

Second. For needy areas UNESCO will publish materials of direct value to schools and institutions, seek fellowships for qualified leaders in these areas, and arrange for specialists to conduct educational seminars and workshops in wartorn sectors. It may underwrite the administrative costs of a few pilot projects in order to stimulate rehabilitation.

Third. UNESCO is authorized to set up a limited reserve fund to purchase surplus war property, especially scientific apparatus, and to pay for the transportation of goods in emergency cases. Resolutions were passed to cooperate with the World Health Organization and with the UN Economic and Social Council in continuing the UNRRA work for children. Close relations between donor and receiving countries were proposed. The Governments of devastated countries will send concrete information on their most urgent needs and report on the operations in their countries of the national and international voluntary relief organizations. Donor countries will be urged to report regularly to UNESCO on the overall progress of their contributions to reconstruction and rehabilitation.

Throughout the planning for reconstruction and rehabilitation the expressed attitude of the conference was that UNESCO should not act as a relief agency. It was agreed that UNESCO could serve most valuably by stimulating and coordinating the relief efforts of voluntary organizations. The total resources of these groups were clearly beyond any that UNESCO itself could muster. As Mr. Benton pointed out in a plenary meeting, American private agencies have already raised, since 1939, some $40,000,000 for relief and reconstruction in UNESCO's fields of interest.

UNESCO'S BUDGET

The activities of the voluntary organizations have an important bearing upon UNESCO's budget. The relative modesty of the sums proposed may be interpreted as the result of a basic philosophy of action. Three considerations dominated the discussion:

First. The Organization is still a fledgling with a tremendous long-term job in front of it. It will be necessary to build soundly, and slowly, for a continuing program. For that reason, if for none other, 1947 should be a year of exploration and programing for UNESCO.

Second. It was agreed among the delegates that UNESCO should initiate few direct-action projects. Its role was conceived as being primarily to stimulate and facilitate. A minimum of pilot ventures should be set up and operated in the closest possible collaboration with the other agencies of United Nations. It is expected that these pilot projects will then provide a nucleus for expended private and governmental cooperation along the major lines of a sound program. They should provide the initial interest and establish a precedent for others to follow.

Third. Membership of UNESCO does not now include all of the United Nations. An ambitious program at this time would impose disproportionate costs on the present members and commit governments which may later enter the organization to actions which they did not help to formulate.

The Administrative and Financial Subcommission proposed that the conference adopt a budget for 1947 of $6,950,000 and set up a revolving fund of $3,000,000 to provide a means by which UNESCO can continue to operate each year pending receipt of contributions from member states. The resolutions containing these figures were adopted by the General Conference, on the understanding that contributions would be subject to the legislative decisions of the member governments, and that allocation of the funds would be subject to the approval of the Executive Board.

Of the adopted figure of $6,950,000 the resolution stipulated that $6,000,000 must be allocated to UNESCO activities, including (a) educational, scientific, and cultural reconstruction, and (b) a substantial contingent fund, at least at the beginning of the year. The remaining amount not exceeding $950,000 must be allocated to paying costs incurred prior to January 1, 1947. These costs represented the repayment of the amounts expended by Great Britain and France on the work of the Preparatory Commission.

THE REVOLVING FUND

The purpose of the revolving fund of $3,000,000 is to supply the Organization with sufficient permanent operating capital to carry it from 1 year's budget to another. The fund would thus provide an operating credit for the awkward but unavoidable period of delay at the beginning of each year while the contributions of the member states are being collected and made effective. It was suggested that the fund be made up of deposits from the member states which would be held by the Organization interest free and remain the property of the member states. As contributions are received from member states, the amounts expended from the revolving fund are returned to it. The adopted resolution reads:

Deposits to be made by member states to the revolving fund, which shall be interest-free and shall remain the property of the member states, shall be made in the same ratios as the contributions of Member States to the budget of the Organization for the year 1947.

DEBATE ON THE BUDGET

There was considerable debate on the total figure of the 1947 budget, both in the subcommission and in the plenary meetings of the General Conference. The subcommission had before it two estimates. One was that of the Preparatory Commission based upon the projects it had submitted. The other was an informal estimate presented by the Secretariat and based upon the projects voted by the Program Commission of the General Conference. After the consideration of both estimates the subcommission concluded that a more careful cost analysis was required. It felt that the programs should be reformulated as specific projects, cost estimates prepared, and the whole appraised in terms of priorities and available funds. It therefore decided to vote a lump sum rather than an itemized budget, leaving the preparation of a detailed budget to the Director General and the Executive Board. Throughout the budget debates the United States position was consistently for a modest budget for the first year of operation. This position won out in the approved budget of $6,950,000.

AMENDMENTS REJECTED

The debate in the plenary meetings concerned two proposed amendments. The delegate of the United Kingdom moved that the budget figure be increased $1,500,000, to a total of $7,500,000 for activities and $950,000 for past expenses. In the discussion the increase was approved by the Danish, Polish, and Indian delegates, and opposed by the delegates of the United States, Czechoslovakia, Australia, South Africa, and New Zealand. The amendment was rejected by a vote of 20 to 8. The second proposal introduced by the French delegate asked for an increase of $550,000, with the provision that this additional sum be devoted to rehabilitation projects in education, science, and culture. The United States delegate pointed out that private organizations in the United States have made great efforts to obtain the funds required for reconstruction and rehabilitation, and that if the amendment was accepted, there would be a danger that the work undertaken by UNESCO would duplicate that done by the American organizations. A vote by roll call rejected the amendment by 18 votes to 10.

CONTRIBUTIONS OF MEMBER STATES

The problem of adjusting the individual contributions of member states to the budget of UNESCO raises some difficult questions. The resolution adopted by the General Conference resolved that the scale for 1947 shall be as follows:

1. The scale shall be that adopted by the United Nations for contributions to its administrative budget, subject to the adjustment specified in (2) below;

2. Inasmuch as the membership of the United Nations and UNESCO are not identical, the scale established under (1) above shall be adjusted to cover the budget of the organization.

3. The Executive Board, to whom the duty of making the adjustment in conformity with the principles adopted by the United Nations as regards contributions is hereby entrusted shall, before promulgating the scale, enter into such consultations with member States as may be desirable.

The United States now contributes approximately 40 percent of the budget of the United Nations. The precise figure, I believe, is 39.89 percent. This percentage, adjusted as indicated in the resolution, would bring the United States contribution to the UNESCO budget to approximately 47 percent. The Department of State, however, proposed that this percentage be reduced by setting aside 5 percent of the total budget to be paid by states expected to become members during the year. This brings the United States' percentage down to 44.03 percent. The same ratio is used as a basis of detemination of each member nation's share in the revolving fund. The Department has proposed that only $1,000,000 of the revolving fund be called this year. On this basis the United States' share will be approximately $3,000,000 to the budget and about $500,000 to the revolving fund—a total of about $3,500,000. This amount represents, as you may note, about two-thirds of the cost of a modern submarine.

1947 A YEAR OF BEGINNINGS

The views of the United States delegation on the budget and the plans for 1947 were presented most accurately by Mr. Benton at the seventh plenary meeting of the general conference. He termed the amounts proposed for UNESCO a "fledgling budget" and warned that governments should not regard it as establishing the norm for future years.

If we think of it as the fledgling that indeed it is, while we test our wings and plan our course of flight—

He told the delegates—

this will prepare our governments for the more costly projects that UNESCO must embrace when the world emerges from this period of struggle for subsistence. Future budgets must be scaled to the magnitude of UNESCO's opportunities; and to the promise of UNESCO's organization as it grows in strength.

The year 1947 will be clearly a year of beginnings for UNESCO, a year of exploring and planning by a fledgling organization with much to learn and achieve on a primary level. It will take time to weld together an international body and infuse it with a single purpose. And it will take time to create liaison channels and collaborative units. UNESCO's task is reminiscent of the difficulties faced in the establishment of the United States. For the six long and troubled years following the Revolutionary War the word "united" was an ironical term to apply to our Nation. It was only in 1789, with the establishment of our present Government, that the 13 separate sovereignties of the Original States were brought into an actual unity. It may take UNESCO even more than 6 years to achieve its characteristic form, but 1947 will undoubtedly be a year in which reasonable men will need to exercise caution in their judgments of its possibilities.

THE PERMANENT SECRETARIAT

One immediate problem facing UNESCO is that of building a secretariat. The member states are understandably anxious to place as many of their nations as they can upon the permanent staff of UNESCO. A resolution adopted by the Conference authorized the director-general "to continue the employment of the members of the staff of the Preparatory Commission under the present terms and regulations until February 28, 1947, or until such prior date as the director-general may determine."

To assemble a permanent secretariat on such short notice will not be easy. To make it a representative one will be still more difficult. There is a world shortage of trained men that is most keenly felt in the smaller nations. These countries are already taxed by the effort of maintaining competent staffs in the United Nations and in its specialized agencies. UNESCO has considered various training and "apprenticeship" programs to this end. The problem now is the clear necessity of securing the best possible secretariat for UNESCO and the equally clear danger that it might be a second-rate one.

UNESCO'S RELATIONSHIPS

UNESCO has recently formalized its relationship with the United Nations. Other steps to be taken include, first, conclusion of a General Convention on the privileges and immunities granted by member states; second, assistance in setting up national commissions in member states which have not originated such bodies; third, the creation of liaison with the international nongovernmental organizations; and fourth, the initiation of formal agreements with the other specialized agencies of the United Nations.

Upon completion of these steps UNESCO should be able to enter fully into the planned teamwork of the commissions and specialized agencies which will operate under the general guidance of the Economic and Social Council of the United Nations. Five of the specialized agencies are now in official operation. They are UNESCO, the Food and Agriculture Organization, the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development, the International Monetary Fund, the Provisional International Civil Aviation Organization, and the International Labor Organization. Two others have reached an interim status. They are the World Health Organization and the International Refugee Organization. A third, the International Trade Organization, has just begun to emerge from the planning stage.

The concept of planned teamwork will determine most of UNESCO's active relationships. One expected result will be immediate action on the cooperative programs, especially those which call for the use of equipment and established channels. As a fledgling organization UNESCO naturally has few facilities in the media of mass communication. Yet one of the brightest notes in its future is the implied support of governments which have developed the means of broad-scale cultural relations. The cooperative use of national facilities will be a responsibility placed upon each such member government. This added obligation is one which the House might do well to keep in mind when it considers the appropriation for the Department of State's information and cultural relations program.

UNESCO'S FUTURE

The difficulties facing UNESCO in 1947 are, in summary, the normal and expected difficulties of a new organization. Restraint and a limited program in keeping with the realities have discounted most of them in advance. Eventual success or failure for UNESCO will depend, as it does for the whole of the United Nations effort, upon the support of the great world powers. As one of the sponsoring Governments for both the United Nations and UNESCO, the United States should act with promptness in exercising the leadership and statesmanship necessary to ensure the success of UNESCO, the one specialized agency of the United Nations devoted to producing a world mentality which will make enduring peace possible.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. SMITH of Wisconsin.) Under previous order of the House, the gentleman from Rhode Island [Mr. FOGARTY] is recognized for 15 minutes.

LABOR LEGISLATION

Mr. FOGARTY. Mr. Speaker, there is a lot of talk today about the need to protect all Americans against the harmful effects of selfish acts by individuals or groups of individuals.

The majority party in Congress pledged itself to do this and to bring order out of what it termed confusion in the field of industrial relations and to provide the benefits of progress and prosperity to all Americans—and not merely to the privileged few.

What has happened? The Labor Department—a Department of Cabinet rank, set up to plan and provide for stable and satisfactory labor relations, is threatened with drastic budget cuts which will reduce to practical impotency those sections which deal intimately with the everyday problems of working men and women. This defies the development of a stable and satisfactory industrial relations policy.

At the same time, the Department of Justice faces the prospect of insufficient funds for its Antitrust Division, so that it will be unable to raise more than a feeble whisper in the never-ending fight against monopoly and the concentration of national wealth in the hands of the privileged few.

Like the weather—economic security is drawing a great deal of comment—everyone talks about it but little is being done about it.

Hundreds of measures have been poured into the hoppers of this Eightieth Congress, everyone presented as the absolute solution to the many and complex problems which surround the industrial life of our country. But, little if any consideration is given to the history of that industrial life, and the background of what we term today—our industrial relations.

Admission is made that security is a desirable thing. Promises are made that everything possible will be done to promote that security. But, actually, all the emphasis is on legislation which will impose restrictions on the operations of labor unions and their members.

Free enterprise is presented as the great goal toward which we must strive. But, under the guise of fostering free enterprise, there is a constant clamor to strip trade-unions of all forms of freedom and initiative. Labor is blamed for all our economic, social, and political ills. The great hope of the country, some insist, lies in the elimination—or at least the drastic curtailment—of these trade-union bodies.

There have been occasions when unions have been guilty of errors of judgment. There have been times in the past when labor unions have been driven, by sheer desperation, to adopt some of the ignoble tactics of their employers, in order to wrest from the clutches of greedy operators some semblance of social justice.

The possibility of error is one of the failings of human nature.

But throughout the entire history of the trade-union movement labor has waged the greatest battle for social justice for all the people. Without the trade-union movement the little man and woman would not yet have a spokesman to plead his cause for a better share of the fruits of his toil.

There was a time, and it is well within the recollection of most of men living today, when labor was regarded as free and independent. The greatest Court in the land handed down momentous decisions upholding the freedom of the employee.

He was free to bargain away the best years of his life in virtual bondage for whatever pittance a mill owner or industrial magnate saw fit to award him. He was free to live in company villages and buy his employers' provisions—with all hope for the future denied him and his family—as he accepted, week after week, instead of a pay envelope, an account of his steadily mounting debt to the company store. He was free to accept this generous provision for his welfare—as he was free to refuse it and to starve.

In those so-called good old days of industrial freedom, the employee had no leaders, and he looked in the direction of management; but that management failed him.

The management which now cries about injustice and pleads for more equitable consideration had the opportunity to provide the leadership, which it now claims is misused by labor unions, but it rejected that opportunity because of its selfishness and greed.

In the early days of our country, with our free enterprise system, leadership naturally went to those men with initiative and ability, who gathered together the men and the machines, the material and the money, for the production of goods of all sorts.

In the field of material things, they provided brilliant leadership. They built the best factories and shops in the world. They developed the best machinery and equipment. They built the fastest vessels to sail the seas of the world, and they exploited the best markets. Their enterprises expanded, and their coffers swelled until we were looked upon as a nation mighty and wealthy in material resources.

But for the human element, which made their vast progress possible, management had never a thought unless it was one of contempt. Industrialists proclaimed, as an incontrovertible fact, that the labor of men was merely an article of commerce to be purchased at the lowest possible price. Laborers were set one against the other, competing for the available jobs, willing to accept any price in order to provide their families with at least the absolute minimum of life-sustaining food and cover. No attempt was made to raise employees to a higher standard. The direct opposite of such a plan was the mode of the day. Concentration was placed rather on labor-saving devices, the stretch-out, lay-offs, and the ever-present specter of unemployment with its resultant hunger, poverty, and misery.

Those days are not so far back in the shadows of time that we cannot recall them vividly. In the life of this mortal sphere which we inhabit for a short while, those days were but yesterday. And their recollection makes it quite clear why employees formed labor unions to get for themselves and their children a little better lot in life, a little bit more of the wealth they were helping to create by the sweat of their brows.

Form labor unions they did—and offered to management once more an opportunity for the leadership which it now decries in others. There was an opportunity for management to demonstrate its sincere belief in the future well-being of the country—and its confidence in the honesty and decency of the average American man and woman. But management spurned this opportunity and met the offers of trade unions with rebuffs, lock-outs, and in many instances, goons, guns, and bludgeons.

The company union and the yellow-dog contract were the weapons ready at hand, and the employers made use of them in their blind hatred of unions. With them they sought to beat their employees back into the state of dumb submission which had marked their former years.

But because man is an individual created by God—with a dignity which demands expression and respect—management failed in this ruthless war on the organizations workingmen had created as an expression of their God-given free will.

Instead of the cooperation which was sought, management gave the labor unions insult and abuse, and labor unions were forced, whether they would or no, to turn to their Government—the Government of the people, for the people, and by the people—for recognition and protection of the rights with which they were endowed as free men.

Industrialists with vision, conscious of the changing pattern of man's thinking, aware of the constant development of human society, had realized that the union was here to stay. They sought, through cooperation, as free men, to achieve their common goal. Their success makes up the most brilliant chapter in the story of industrial relations in the United States.

But those who molded opinion among the leaders of management generally, refused to recognize the union, refused to bargain with the chosen representatives of their employees. The natural result of this blind obstinacy was the enactment, by Congress, of the Wagner Act with its recognition and protection of collective bargaining.

Management had always provided for the retirement and replacement of its equipment and capital goods—it provided insurance for the down time of its machinery—but made no provisions for the human beings which operated it. When those human beings turned to their Government for the leadership they found lacking in management, that Government provided social security to see they received some consideration when they were unable, through unemployment or old age to earn their sustenance.

In many industries management insisted on sweatshop wages and working conditions. The Government—into whose arms labor had been driven—provided the Fair Labor Standards Act, in an endeavor to assure at least a minimum of earning power and a maximum of decency.

Because this recognition had been made of the permanence of trade-unions, their representatives were enabled to bargain for, and obtain, vacations with pay—group insurance—sickness benefits, and other considerations which management had looked upon as revolutionary and evil.

Management, which had the opportunity for leadership and had failed, then found itself subject to many administrative orders and regulations, which apparently were considered obnoxious. It bewailed the fact that it could no longer bargain with its employees—but must also bargain with the State as the supreme authority. It now finds labor, quite understandably, unwilling to give up the protections which it has won after a long and bitter and bloody struggle.

Management claims it is no longer free and cries for what it terms "corrective legislation," but in its refusal to face facts it is actually fighting for the imposition of even more legislative and administrative orders and decrees.

Examine the present crop of labor legislation with which this Congress is expected to wrestle. Does it return industrial relations to the shop and the factory? Does it seek to promote genuine collective bargaining among free men?

Quite the contrary, it seeks to replace one set of rules with another; to supplant one service by setting up a greater and more powerful one; to replace one board by an inverted pyramid of services, boards, commissions, and courts.

Then what is the answer? The answer lies with management once again. Let it demonstrate that it has learned from experience and make a showing of the leadership of which it claims it is capable.

In the field of science, with technical skills, in the development of material resources, industry has demonstrated its know-how. Pains are taken to develop the best—to provide the finest—to become the greatest. Why would it not be worth while to experiment with this painstaking effort in the field of human relations?

The present majority party in Congress vowed that the solution of all our ills lay in the removal of Federal controls.

Abundance of food, clothing, housing, and supplies of all kinds awaited only on the demise of OPA. Thus spoke the voice of management just a few months ago. It has had its way and the result is apparent to all.

Consider if you will the plight of the man trying to maintain a home and raise a family on $40 a week—and most shop workers and laborers do not make that much. The cost of the necessities of life is constantly rising. Monopoly—in fact, not fancy—is interested only in getting all the traffic will bear. It is impossible to make a week's pay cover the essentials which a family needs. Every working man and woman has actually had his purchasing power reduced by half.

Instead of the abundance he was promised—he faces going without the things his family needs—because his week's pay cannot stretch far enough.

How can he be sold on economic philosophies under such circumstances?

How can he be convinced of the desirability of our free enterprise system?

Is it not only natural—in the face of these facts—that he should ask for more money? Is it surprising that he should insist on being paid enough to care properly for his family? Yet, he is told that the increases he has been given in the past are responsible for the present high prices. You know, and I know, that industry exacted ten times as much in increased prices as it gave out in wage increases to its employees. In recent weeks there have been no wage increases—but you know and I know what has happened to prices. One industrialist decided of his own accord to reduce prices in order to stimulate an orderly return to normal market conditions. His associates—and industry in general—laughed at his gesture and gave prices another boost.

Is this the way to restore economic sanity? Is this the social justice which has been promised if free enterprise were but allowed to go its own way unmolested?

In my opinion—management is inviting more trouble. It is refusing once again to demonstrate any capacity for leadership. Its selfishness and greed will destroy all hope of free collective bargaining between employer and employee.

Its present insistence on legislation is of the sort to bring about that result. It is insisting on more controls instead of less. It is fostering a greater dependence upon the state rather than greater reliance on cooperation among free men. The net result will be state control—not alone control of labor unions—but of industry as well. And when that day dawns, management will again blame labor unions for its plight. But—if that happens—it would not be important to decide where the responsibility lies—because free enterprise, as such, will be through. We will have a system of socialism—and it will do no good to wail about the glories of the past.

SENATE

FRIDAY, MARCH 7, 1947

(Legislative day of Wednesday, February 19, 1947)

The Senate met at 12 o'clock meridian, on the expiration of the recess.

The Chaplain, Rev. Peter Marshall, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O Thou Holy Spirit, who hast promised to lead us into all truth, prepare our hearts and minds for the business of this day, that we may behave with true courtesy and honor. Compel us to be just and honest in all our dealings. Let our motives be above suspicion. Let our word be our bond. Save us from the fallacy of depending upon our personality, or ingenuity, or position, to solve our problems. Since Thou hast the answers, make us willing to listen to Thee, that we may vote on God's side, and that God's will may be done in us. Through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

THE JOURNAL

On request of Mr. WHITE, and by unanimous consent, the reading of the Journal of the proceedings of Wednesday, March 5, 1947, was dispensed with, and the Journal was approved.

MESSAGES FROM THE PRESIDENT—APPROVAL OF BILL AND JOINT RESOLUTIONS

Messages in writing from the President of the United States were communicated to the Senate by Mr. Miller, one of his secretaries, and he announced that on today, March 7, 1947, the President had approved and signed the following act and joint resolutions:

S. 235. An act to authorize the Secretary of the Navy to convey to the city of Los Angeles, Calif., an easement for construction and operation of a storm drain in and under certain Government-owned lands situated in that city;
S. J. Res. 33. Joint resolution to amend the act of August 9, 1946 (Public Law 711, 79th Cong.), for the purpose of allowing the Philadelphia National Shrines Park Commission additional time in which to prepare and submit its report to the Congress; and
S. J. Res. 60. Joint resolution to authorize the San Carlos irrigation and drainage district, Arizona, to drill, equip, and acquire wells for use on the San Carlos irrigation project.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Swanson, one of its reading clerks, announced that the House had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 1030) to continue in effect certain war excise-tax rates, and for other purposes.

The message also announced that the House had disagreed to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 1968) making appropriations to supply urgent deficiencies in certain appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1947, and for other purposes; agreed to the conference asked by the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and that Mr. TABER, Mr. WIGGLESWORTH, Mr. ENGEL of Michigan, Mr. STEFAN, Mr. CASE of South Dakota, Mr. KEEFE, Mr. CANNON, Mr. KERR, and Mr. MAHON were appointed managers on the part of the House at the conference.

ANNOUNCEMENT AS TO NIGHT SESSIONS AND NOTICE OF REPUBLICAN CONFERENCE

Mr. TAFT. Mr. President, it was formally announced, I may say, by unanimous vote of the Republican conference, that there would be sessions of the Senate Monday and Wednesday evenings, beginning next Monday. The measure now before the Senate is the only one of any particular importance ready at the moment for consideration. The portal-to-portal pay bill and the Lilienthal nomination, I thought, would be reported this week, but it now appears they will not be reported until Monday, and will not be on the calendar until Wednesday. Therefore, it will not be necessary to have a night session Monday. We expect to proceed with the night session on Wednesday.

I may say further to the Republicans that it is planned to have a Republican conference Monday evening, and, since Senators no doubt expected a night session of the Senate on Monday, I hope they will be able to attend the Republican conference that evening, of which notice will be sent them.

A joint memorial of the Legislature of the State of Montana; to the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare:

"House Joint Memorial 12

"Joint memorial to the Congress of the United States of America, to the Honorable United States Senators JAMES E. MURRAY and ZALES N. ECTON, and to the Honorable Representatives in Congress MIKE MANSFIELD and WESLEY A. D'EWART, and to the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs requesting that the sum being paid by the Veterans' Administration to the State auditor of Montana for the care of eligible members of the Montana State Soldiers Home be increased

"To the Honorable Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress Assembled:

"Whereas the cost of maintaining the State soldiers' home for the care and comfort of veterans and their widows entitled to admission to such home has steadily increased: Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved, That the House of Representatives of the Thirtieth Legislative Assembly of the State of Montana (the Senate of said Assembly concurring), does most respectfully urge the Congress of the United States that the said Congress cause necessary action to be initiated by the Director of the Veterans' Administration to make necessary appropriations to provide for an increase in the present payment of $75 per quarter per patient to $125 per quarter per patient; be it further

"Resolved, That duly attested copies of this memorial be transmitted to both Houses of Congress, to the Honorable James E. Murray and the Honorable Zales N. "House Joint Memorial 9

"Joint memorial to the Congress of the United States urging the immediate enactment of legislation to extend the terms of the Steagall amendment to the Commodity Credit Act beyond December 31, 1948

"To the Honorable Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress Assembled:

"Whereas by action of the President of the United States cessation of hostilities has been proclaimed; and

"Whereas under the Steagall amendment to the Commodity Credit Act such proclamation has the effect of terminating the present parity-support-price program with the 1948 crop year; and

"Whereas there is still need for record-breaking production of food to aid the starving of the world and farmers of America are still being urged to produce to the limit of their capacity to aid the starving peoples of the world; and

"Whereas unless steps are taken to prevent a disastrous drop in agricultural prices such as that which occurred after World War I the farmers of America cannot with safety meet the production goals now needed; and

"Whereas the farmers of America may face disaster through a sudden and drastic farm price reduction; and

"Whereas such a drastic drop in agricultural prices which will occur unless steps are taken now to prevent it will severely penalize the farmers of America for their high production which contributed so greatly to the winning of the war: Now, therefore, be it

By Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma:

A resolution of the Senate of the State of Oklahoma; to the Committee on Banking and Currency:

"Enrolled Senate Resolution 6

"Resolution requesting the Congress of the United States to enact legislation regulating trading in farm products on commodity exchanges and boards of trade, and to establish a uniform system of grading of farm products

"Whereas there was wide and unusual fluctuations in the price of cotton and other farm products on the commodity exchanges and boards of trade during the period between July 1, 1946, and January 1, 1947; and

"Whereas there is no apparent reason for the break in the cotton market and the wide variation in the price of other commodities during this period except speculation and possible manipulation of prices, which is made possible because of lack of regulation of trading in such commodities on such exchanges and boards of trade; and

"Whereas speculation and manipulation is encouraged by the fact that sales of such commodities may be, and are frequently, made without delivery of the commodity sold by persons who do not have or own the commodity which they purport to sell; and

"Whereas this speculative trading in such commodities has resulted in serious losses to the producers of such commodities who must sell same at or near the time when produced and has further resulted in increased cost to consumers: Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved by the Senate of the Twenty-first Legislature of the State of Oklahoma:

"SECTION 1. The Congress of the United States is requested to enact legislation placing the control of commodity exchanges and boards of trade directly under the supervision of the State department of agriculture, and to enact laws to regulate the sale of farm products on such exchanges and boards of trade, to protect producers and processors of cotton, grains, and other commodities.

"SEC. 2. The Congress of the United States is further requested to cause a complete investigation to be made of the cotton exchanges and boards of trade throughout the United States by the Department of Agriculture and the Department of Justice working in conjunction with each other for the purpose of making findings of fact, and recommendation as to legislation needed, to correct and eliminate the evils of speculative trade in farm commodities.

"SEC. 3. The Congress of the United States is further requested to immediately enact legislation which will prohibit the sale of cotton and grain on exchanges and boards of trade by any person who does not have actual possession of a warehouse receipt or certificate covering evidence of ownership of the amount of cotton or amount of grain sold by such person; and requiring that every such sale shall be accompanied by the transfer of a warehouse receipt or certificate evidencing title to the commodity sold or transferred, and that the number of bales of cotton or bushels of grain that may be sold by any one person, firm, or corporation during any one day be limited. It is further recommended that the Congress limit the amount by which the price of cotton or grain may be reduced on any exchange or board of trade in any one day to $2 per bale on cotton and one-half percent per bushel on wheat.

"SEC. 4. It is further suggested that the Congress of the United States should enact legislation establishing a uniform system for the grading of cotton and grains by licensed graders throughout the United States, and providing that when any such products are graded, the grade thereby established, subject to appeal therefrom by the producer, shall constitute the final grade of such product which shall be used as the basis for the determination of value in all subsequent sales of such commodities, and that the grade thereof be endorsed on the warehouse receipt at the time that such products are warehoused.

"SEC. 5. The president pro tempore of the senate is directed to send two certified copies of this resolution to the Agriculture Committees of both Houses of Congress, the Secretary of Agriculture, and to each member of the Oklahoma congressional delegation.

"Adopted by the senate, February 20, 1947."

"Enrolled Senate Joint Memorial 2

"Joint memorial to the Congress of the United States petitioning Congress to strengthen present sanitary requirements governing the importation of livestock and livestock products and to appropriate additional funds to the Bureau of Animal Industry, United States Department of Agriculture, in order that border inspection may be strengthened and a system of patrol established along the northern boundary of Mexico to guard against the importation of people, animals, and materials carrying the infection of foot-and-mouth disease, and also petitioning Congress to offer to the Government of the Republic of Mexico such facilities as may be available from the Bureau of Animal Industry, United States Department of Agriculture, and appropriating money to provide for such facilities and to extend aid to the Government of the Republic of Mexico in order that foot-and-mouth disease may be eradicated

"To the President of the United States and to the Honorable Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress Assembled:

"Whereas foot-and-mouth disease now exists in livestock in the Republic of Mexico; and

"Whereas the disease has spread from the six original States involved in the vicinity of Mexico City as far west and north as the State of Zacatecas; and

"Whereas it is extremely doubtful if the Government of the Republic of Mexico can eradicate this disease from their livestock without additional assistance; and

"Whereas the presence of foot-and-mouth disease in the Republic of Mexico prevents a very definite threat to the prosperity of the livestock industry and the entire economic welfare of the United States: Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved by the Twenty-ninth Legislative Assembly of the State of Wyoming (the Senate and House of Representatives concurring), That we earnestly petition the Congress of the United States to strengthen the present sanitary requirements governing the importation of livestock and livestock products from Mexico and from other countries in which foot-and-mouth disease exists; be it further

"Resolved, That we earnestly petition Congress to appropriate additional funds to the Bureau of Animal Industry, United States Department of Agriculture in order that border inspection may be strengthened and a system of patrol be established along the northern boundary of Mexico to guard against the importation of people, animals, and materials carrying the infection of foot-and-mouth disease; be it further

A joint memorial of the Legislature of the State of Wyoming; to the Committee on Finance:

"Enrolled Senate Joint Memorial 5

"Joint memorial memorializing the Congress of the United States of America to enact legislation relating to employers' sinking funds and reserves and taxability thereof

"Whereas sound efforts by employers to set aside sinking funds and to establish other reserves for employment of returned veterans, for the taking care of necessarily deferred maintenance, for plant and other industrial reconversions, for current post-war business adjustments, for protection of livestock against adverse weather hazards, and as a precaution against otherwise required payment of interest in the future on money which must be borrowed if present surpluses are dissipated and present market conditions or income levels become depressed, are now impaired if not completely frustrated by United States Treasury Department regulations under which the Internal Revenue Bureau assumes arbitrary authority to decide whether or not such reserves and funds are so 'unduly' accumulated as to require their being either distributed or taxed out of existence, thus defeating experience-based plans of employers to safeguard the future welfare of their employees and business corporations, resulting in present unnecessary and unwarranted spending of funds which should be preserved to accomplish the future purposes indicated and to preserve a stable, tax-producing structure: Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved by the Senate of the Twenty-ninth Legislature of the State of Wyoming (its House of Representatives concurring), That the Congress of the United States is hereby memorialized to promptly enact suitable legislation as required to eliminate or appropriately modify the criticized regulations, to expressly permit and encourage accumulations by business enterprises and other employers, of sinking funds and other reserves for the objectives stated and to provide that while set aside as such, they shall not be so taxed as to defeat their intended purposes; and be it further

"Resolved, That copies of this memorial be sent to the President of the United States Senate, the Speaker of the United States House of Representatives, to Hon. JOSEPH C. O'MAHONEY, Hon. EDWARD V. ROBERTSON, and Hon. FRANK A. BARRETT, Senators and Representative, respectively, in the United States Congress, from Wyoming.

CONCURRENT RESOLUTION OF SOUTH CAROLINA LEGISLATURE RELATING TO AMENDMENT OF SOCIAL SECURITY ACT

Mr. MAYBANK. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to present for appropriate reference and printing in the RECORD a concurrent resolution of the Legislature of the State of South Carolina memorializing the Congress to amend the Social Security Act in certain particulars.

There being no objection, the concurrent resolution was received, referred to the Committee on Finance, and, under the rule, ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Concurrent resolution memorializing the Congress of the United States to amend the Social Security Act in certain particulars

Whereas the existing method of providing grants-in-aid to the various States for public assistance under the Social Security Act of Congress results in unequal Federal aid to needy persons in equal need but residing in different States, and provides least adequate Federal aid in those States where the need is most acute; and

Whereas the existing method of providing grants-in-aid for public assistance limits such aid to needy persons over 65 years of age, to dependent children under 18 years of age, and to needy blind persons, and provides no Federal aid for other mentally or physically handicapped persons in need; and

Whereas the insurance provisions of the Social Security Act at present exclude millions of workers who are entitled, equally with those included, to the benefits provided in the insurance titles of the act: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the House of Representatives of the State of South Carolina (the Senate concurring):

1. That the Congress of the United States be, and it is hereby, respectfully urged to amend the Social Security Act during its current session so as to:

(a) Provide for Federal grants-in-aid to the State for public assistance on the basis of the economic capacity of the respective States to provide such assistance from their own resources, in order that persons in equal need may be given approximately equal aid without regard to their States of residence;

(b) Provide for Federal grants-in-aid to the States, on the same basis, for the assistance of mentally or physically handicapped persons in need without regard to age;

(c) Provide for the inclusion of the entire working population of the country under the insurance provisions of the act.

2. That certified copies of this resolution be forwarded to the President pro tempore of the Senate of the United States, to the Speaker of the National House of Representatives, and to each Senator and Representative from the State of South Carolina in the Congress of the United States.

(The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a concurrent resolution of the Legislature of the State of South Carolina identical with the foregoing, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.)

RESOLUTION BY STATE-WIDE FARMERS MEETING AT REDFIELD, S. DAK.

Mr. BUSHFIELD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to present for appropriate reference and printing in the RECORD a resolution adopted by farmers at a State-wide meeting at Redfield, S. Dak.

There being no objection, the resolution was received, referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

REDFIELD RESOLUTION A PRONOUNCEMENT THAT WILL STAND—THE REDFIELD EXPRESSION IN ITS ENTIRETY—READ IT AND BE CONVINCED THAT FARMERS ARE CAPABLE OF SPEAKING FOR THEMSELVES WHEN GIVEN AN OPPORTUNITY TO DO SO

Whereas the plight of landlocked States became further aggravated by reason of the Panama Canal, which brought water-borne commerce rates into competiiton with transcontinental rail shipments, as a result of which there followed reduced transcontinental rail rates and increased rail rates from either coast to interior points and between interior points, resulting in population gains along the seaboards and depopulation of landlocked States suffering from high freight rates and inadequate transportation service; and

Whereas railroads exacting confiscatory rates for bad service are resisting Missouri River navigation; and

Whereas the Minneapolis private grain trade fearing diversion of grain from Minneapolis to down-stream markets has taken a stand against navigation; and

Whereas South Dakota is in a high cost electric power producing area due to the local availability of neither oil nor suitable coal for electric power production; and

Whereas private electric power companies have conducted a campaign of contradiction, confusion, and distortion of facts to limit production of Missouri River power and obstruct transmission of electric power to consumers at cost. Contradictory propaganda calculated to throttle production of electricity has followed these two patterns: (1) Only enough electric power can be generated to pump water out of the river for irrigation; (2) electric power potentialities are so enormous as to make maximum production unnecessary and extravagantly wasteful; and

Whereas the Pick-Sloan plan, designed to impound flood waters in the upper reaches of the Missouri River back of a series of mud dams without lock systems for navigation, holds forth no definite assurance of electric power production beyond the amount required to pump water out of the river for irrigation to which it grants priority; and

Whereas the Pick-Sloan combination seeks to return agriculture to prewar economic conditions by solving problems which do not exist and by ignoring problems which do exist—by emphasizing irrigation and by excluding navigation and by producing only an undetermined amount of electric energy with whatever water is left after saturating 5,000,000 acres of land to artificially produce more food to further aggravate an already threatened over-production before completion of the project; and

Whereas approximately 75 percent of the power generating sites on the main stem of the Missouri River are located in South Dakota; from which points, electric power could be successfully transmitted to all parts of our State, and long-distance transmission lines could deliver electricity to rural and urban consumers in other valley States which would require maximum production to the last kilowatt; and

Whereas the pressing need in landlocked raw-material States is navigation plus an abundance of low-cost electric power to diversify our economy, promote industry, create a home market for farm products and to conserve coal and oil; and

Whereas this Nation confronted with the possibility of an atomic race involving all major nations necessitates maximum power generation and inland navigation to serve defense plants located in the interior: Therefore be it

Resolved by the farmers at this State-wide meeting at Redfield, S. Dak., this 28th day of February 1947, That we reject irrigation priority; denounce Pick-Sloan mud dams without lock systems; and disapprove of electric power limitations; be it further

Resolved, That we propose to attain our objective by unequivocally supporting impoundment of flood waters back of a series of indestructible, reinforced, multipurpose, concrete dams in the upper reaches of the Missouri River, with maximum power-generating facilities; lock installations for navigation; surplus water for irrigation where feasible; and transmission of current to all consumers in valley States at cost with decentralized administrative authority; be it still further

Resolved, That copies of this resolution be sent to President Truman, Secretary of Interior Krug, and to South Dakota Senators and Congressmen.

RESOLUTION BY OFFICIALS OF VILLAGE OF HAMPDEN, N. DAK.

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to present for appropriate reference and to have printed in the body of the RECORD a resolution adopted by the officials of the village of Hampden, N. Dak.

There being no objection, the resolution was received, referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

The following resolution was adopted by the Board of Hampden Village at a meeting held on this 3d day of March 1947:

"Whereas surveys and investigations have advanced to a stage on the Heart River project, the Sheyenne Dam of the Missouri Souris project, where construction could be started in 1947; and

"Whereas construction of these units are vital to the economic welfare and domestic water needs of North Dakota and the furtherance of the Missouri Basin water development program; and

"Whereas the Bureau of Reclamation is charged with the responsibility of the construction of these projects: Therefore be it

"Resolved by the Board of Hampden Village, That we urge Congress to provide the necessary funds to start actual construction of these units during the fiscal year 1948, so that these various units may proceed in an orderly manner to bring about the over-all development, as authorized by Congress; be it further

"Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be sent to the Governor of the State of North Dakota, the Honorable Fred Aandahl, and to the North Dakota delegation in Washington, Hon. William Langer, Hon. Milton Young, Hon. William Lemke, Hon. Charles R. Robertson."

ENROLLED BILL PRESENTED

The Secretary of the Senate reported that on today, March 7, 1947, he presented to the President of the United States the enrolled bill (S. 234) to authorize the Secretary of the Navy to convey to the Central of Georgia Railway Co. an easement for railway purposes in certain Government-owned lands situated in Bibb County, Ga.

AGREEMENTS AMONG COMMON CARRIERS—MINORITY VIEWS (S. REPT. NO. 44)

Mr. TOBEY. Mr. President, there will shortly come before the Senate, Senate bill 110, to amend the Interstate Commerce Act with respect to certain agreements between carriers, commonly known as the Bulwinkle bill, the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce having reported the bill favorably with two dissenting votes.

I present minority views in opposition to the bill. I wish to read the first three paragraphs of my minority views, and then I shall request that they be printed entire as a part of my remarks:

I dissent from the recommendations of a majority of the committee that the bill (S. 110) be passed.

This would give the railroad, motor carrier, water-carrier, pipe-line, and freight-forwarder industries the opportunity of obtaining complete exemption from the antitrust laws. If enacted into law, the proposed legislation would cut the antitrust laws from the heart of our economy—the transportation industry. Such legislation would be an opening wedge in entirely destroying the antitrust laws, designed to guard and preserve the American system of free enterprise.

The obvious purpose of the bill is to deprive the courts of jurisdiction in pending cases instituted by the Department of Justice and the State of Georgia. The Department of Justice, in a suit at Lincoln, Nebr., is seeking to enjoin powerful combinations of railroads, railroad associations, and bankers from violating the antitrust laws, fixing arbitrary and discriminatory freight rates, limiting railroad services, suppressing improvements in railroad equipment and facilities, and preventing the development of modes of transportation competitive with the railroads. The State of Georgia's suit is now being tried in the Supreme Court of the United States and seeks to enjoin combinations in the railroad industry from fixing noncompetitive and discriminatory freight rates. These important cases, brought to enforce basic laws enacted by the Congress, could become moot if this bill is enacted. A dangerous precedent would be set, encouraging other powerful groups to seek legislation immunizing them from established laws and the power of the courts to enforce them.

Cartelization of the transportation industry cannot be isolated from the national economy. Transportation costs are a major element in determining the price of goods in other industries. The power to control the cost of transportation is a power which may be used to dictate whether other businesses shall enjoy competitive success or be stifled to death. Analysis of the bill shows that it would permit the legalization of private controls over the Nation's economy not only by transportation combinations but, under the broad terms of the bill, by industrial and financial combines working in alliance with combinations in the transportation industry. This legislation sets a pattern for supplanting the American system of competitive enterprise and for the cartelization of the Nation's entire economy.

It should be recognized that the enactment of the bill would result in the worst kind of special legislation for special interests. It would constitute a most dangerous precedent which could henceforth be used to justify the exemption of any or all industries from the safeguards of the antitrust laws. The pursuit of such a program inevitably means the extinction of the free and competitive economy of the United States. It is plain, therefore, that the bill should not be enacted into law.

Mr. President, I renew my request that the minority views in their entirely be printed in the RECORD at this point. I may add that one of those favoring the bill and leading the fight for it made the statement that "We have the votes to pass the bill, and we have the votes also to pass it over a veto by the President." That may be true, Mr. President. The wheels may all be greased by fine Italian handwork that may have been done; men may have been seen and cajoled and even threatened, but the Senate of the United States still stands, and I believe in the integrity of its Members and in the cause I represent on this floor. The appeal I make to my fellow Senators is this: Read the minority views; know what you are doing; do not listen to the siren voice of powerful interests; and remember always that our first allegiance is to the people of the United States whom we primarily represent.

There being no objection, the minority views were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

MINORITY VIEWS

I dissent from the recommendations of a majority of the committee that the bill (S. 110) be passed.

This bill would give the railroad, motor carrier, water carrier, pipe line, and freight forwarder industries the opportunity of obtaining complete exemption from the antitrust laws. If enacted into law, the proposed legislation would cut the antitrust laws from the heart of our economy—the transportation industry. Such legislation would be an opening wedge in entirely destroying the antitrust laws, designed to guard and preserve the American system of free enterprise.

The obvious purpose of the bill is to deprive the courts of jurisdiction in pending cases instituted by the Department of Justice and the State of Georgia. The Department of Justice, in a suit at Lincoln, Nebr., is seeking to enjoin powerful combinations of railroads, railroad associations, and bankers from violating the antitrust laws, fixing arbitrary and discriminatory freight rates, limiting railroad services, suppressing improvements in railroad equipment and facilities, and preventing the development of modes of transportation competitive with the railroads. The State of Georgia's suit is now being tried in the Supreme Court of the United States and seeks to enjoin combinations in the railroad industry from fixing noncompetitive and discriminatory freight rates. These important cases, brought to enforce basic laws enacted by the Congress, could become moot if this bill is enacted. A dangerous precedent would be set, encouraging other powerful groups to seek legislation immunizing them from established laws and the power of the courts to enforce them.

Cartelization of the transportation industry cannot be isolated from the national economy. Transportation costs are a major element in determining the price of goods in other industries. The power to control the cost of transportation is a power which may be used to dictate whether other businesses shall enjoy competitive success or be stifled to death. Analysis of the bill shows that it would permit the legalization of private controls over the Nation's economy not only by transportation combinations but, under the broad terms of the bill, by industrial and financial combines working in alliance with combinations in the transportation industry. This legislation sets a pattern for supplanting the American system of competitive enterprise and for the cartelization of the Nation's entire economy.

ANALYSIS OF THE BILL

Under the specific provisions of paragraph (2), the transportation industry could set up and perpetuate a private government which could have the power, through concerted action, to determine the rates to be charged and the service to be performed; the time at which trains shall depart and the time they shall arrive at their destinations, from where they shall leave, over which routes they shall run, and the places at which they shall stop; the equipment and facilities to be used, and whether or not improvements thereon shall be made or suppressed; the part of the rate each carrier shall receive; the allowances which shall be granted to shippers; and the basis and extent of settling claims of passengers and shippers against a particular carrier.

The phrase "promotion of adequacy, economy, or efficiency of operation or service" is so broad as to authorize concerted action comprehending every activity in the transportation industries. It would include the financing, construction, and utilization of equipment, safety devices, facilities, stations, and terminals. It would include action determining whether spur tracks or other facilities, necessary to meet the requirements of particular shippers, shall be constructed, and whether new types of service necessary to promote an advancing economy shall be instituted.

Approval of agreements permitting the industry to organize into combinations and by joint action to make determinations of such wide scope would constitute a delegation to private groups completely to cartelize transportation.

Competition would be eliminated not merely among the carriers of the same type or class but among the several competitive modes of transportation—the railroads, the water carriers, the freight forwarders, the pipe-line companies. Paragraph (4) would permit agreements between carriers of different classes if the agreements concern matters relating to freight classifications or to transportation under joint rates or over through routes. Since rates to be charged for transporting freight are matters relating to freight classifications, this provision would authorize approval of agreements between groups of carriers in the different spheres of transportation whereby the rates in each sphere could be privately manipulated so as to eliminate competition between the various classes of carriers. Moreover, the words "matters relating to * * * transportation under joint rates or over through routes" are so broad as to permit the approval of agreements between the carriers in all the classes of transportation under which collective action could be taken to curtail services, equipment, and facilities. All these things relate to transportation under joint rates or over through routes and, indeed, are within the term "transportation," as defined in the Interstate Commerce Act. The term is defined in that act to include "locomotives, cars, and other vehicles, vessels, and all instrumentalities and facilities of shipment or carriage, irrespective of ownership or of any contract, express or implied, for the use thereof, and all services in connection with the receipt, delivery, elevation, and transfer in transit, ventilation, refrigeration or icing, storage, and handling of property transported."

It would thus be possible for the railroads, the trucks, the water carriers, the freight forwarders, and the pipe lines to combine into private organizations and to take concerted action determining with immunity the rates to be charged, the quality of services to be performed, and the facilities to be installed in each mode of transportation.

Under paragraph (9)—

"No agreement approved by the Commission under this section, and no conference or joint or concerted action pursuant to and in conformity with such agreement as the same may be conditioned by the Commission, shall be deemed to be a contract, combination, conspiracy, or monopoly in restraint of trade or commerce within the meaning of the antitrust laws."

Thus not only would combinations of carriers participating in agreements for joint and concerted action be immunized from the antitrust laws but their bankers and financiers, manufacturers of railroad and other carrier equipment, and powerful shippers, taking "joint or concerted action pursuant to and in conformity with" the carriers' agreement, would be immunized from the antitrust laws. By these adroit provisions, effectively eliminating the application of the antitrust laws, financial and powerful shipping interests, acting through rate-making and other procedures provided in agreements approved by the Interstate Commerce Commission, could ally themselves with the dominant carrier associations to fix transportation rates and limit transportation services so as to stifle new competitors and perpetuate monopoly.

Similarly the bill would permit the reestablishment of old arrangements existing under the illicit "pullman monopoly" recently divested by the courts in an antitrust suit brought by the Government. This monopoly, which had for so long a period of time prevented the introduction and use of modernized and improved equipment, would be restored and the court's mandate nullified.

The approval by the Interstate Commerce Commission, as envisaged by this bill, is not merely with respect to particular rates or other specific action agreed upon or taken by carriers. Under the scheme of the legislation here proposed, the Commission would approve the basic plan of organization setting up the rules, regulations, and procedures under which the private cartel could regiment and control transportation.

The amendments to paragraph (9), adding two provisos thereto, contain much verbiage but fail uttterly to contravene the power of the monopoly group, once its plan of organization is approved by the Commission. The second proviso, that approval of an organization agreement providing for procedures on time schedules, facilities, settlements of claims, and other nonrate matters "shall not be deemed to be approved of any joint or concerted action" on such matters, is meaningless because, under the terms of the bill, exemption from the antitrust laws would apply when concerted action is taken "pursuant to and in conformity with" the approved agreement. Immunity for concerted action flows from approval of the agreement. Concerted action, itself, need not be separately approved. Nor is the first proviso effective in curtailing monopoly power by requiring, in the case of nonrate matters, separate approval of agreements made pursuant to the approved procedures. The power of the monopoly group does not depend on carrier agreements openly arrived at, but on concerted action, effectuated through the coercions and pressures inherent in the organizational structure. Such concerted action, taken through the procedures provided in the association's plans of organizations, would be insulated from attack under the antitrust laws by virtue of previous approval of the plans of organization of, and the procedure in, the associations.

Moreover, even if the amendments to paragraph (9) were effective to deny monopoly the power to control services, the bill, insofar as it provides for the legalization of monopolies in determining prices to be paid for services, is sufficient to stifle competition in the industry.

This bill, which would delegate to the Commission authority to delegate to a private government powers to control every aspect of transportation, could vest in the private government powers greater than those exercised by the Commission itself. As observed by the Commission in its fifty-second annual report (1938):

"There is gross exaggeration in the idea that every act of the railroads is subject to regulation. The railroads have a large degree of initiative in the making of their rates, and have freely made a multitude of reductions to meet competition. We have no power to control their passenger service, and exercise very little control over their freight service. They select and pay their officers without supervision or hindrance. Nor do we undertake to tell them what equipment and supplies they may buy; how they shall operate their shops or maintain their tracks; what rails, ballast, and ties they shall use; what stations or other buildings they shall erect; what construction contracts they shall let; or how they shall manage their affairs in many other ways. The pattern of their regulation is in no way unique but is substantially the same as is now applied generally throughout the country by the States or the Federal Government to other public-utility companies."

But these matters, which the Interstate Commerce Commission declares it has no power to control, could, under this bill, be delegated to a private government to control.

Paragraph (6) purporting to guarantee a party to the agreement the right of independent action is devoid of such guaranty. The paragraph, upon close examination, merely protects the right to take independent action after a determination or report is made through such procedure as is provided in the agreement. The bill does not preserve independent action taken prior to the collective determination. In the face of a determination already collectively agreed upon, a carrier, desirous of deviating from the action of the association, would at once be confronted with the exercise against it of the coercive power of the entire combination. A carrier who persists in adhering to its own managerial prerogatives and rights and who persists in refusing to yield to the collective determination runs the hazard of ostracism as a nonconformist, who takes the benefits of the combination but refuses to make required sacrifices. The detailed day-by-day operations in the transportation industry are so complex and the relationships between the carriers and the industrial and financial interests are so involved as to afford numerous opportunities for retaliatory action against the nonconformist. Such retaliation may be carried out so subtly as to leave no evidence of the restraints exercised against such carrier. Under these circumstances a stipulated right to act independently is illusory. The danger is accentuated when it is considered that, by various devices, initial determinations or reports concerning proposals unsatisfactory to the dominant interests may, under approved procedures as established in the existing private system of judicature of the rate bureaus and associations, be delayed for long periods of time before acted upon.

Moreover, the prohibition in paragraph (6) against boycott, duress, or intimidation would seem to be applicable only to protect independent action following the determination arrived at through the association's procedures. And, in any event, coercion, other than by means of boycott, duress, or intimidation, is at no time prohibited. Economic pressures, exercised by interlocking financial and industrial powers, is sufficient to coerce carrier management.

The sole purpose of this bill is to remove the legal restraints against monopoly inherent in militant enforcement of the antitrust laws. Yet, while the bill would insulate the transportation monopoly and its allies from the courts (pars. (2) and (9)) and reduce the Attorney General to the status of a private complainant before the Interstate Commerce Commission (par. (7)), it would provide no adequate regulatory safeguards, if they be possible, even to insure compliance with agreements approved by the Commission.

Paragraph (7) in essence limits the power of the Commission to determining whether action taken under an agreement approved by the Commission is in conformity with such approval "and is consistent with the standards" set forth in the bill, and whether its approval should be modified or terminated or additional terms or conditions prescribed "with respect to the particular action complained of." Thus, the Commission may merely prescribe additional admonitions for future conduct in the matters complained of. But neither the Commission, nor any other agency of government would, under this bill, be given power to impose any penalty for past offenses.

It must be recognized that the adoption of this bill would result in the worst kind of special legislation for special interests. It would constitute a most dangerous precedent which could henceforth be used to justify the exemption of any or all industries from the safeguards of the antitrust laws. The pursuit of such a program inevitably means the extinction of the free and competitive economy of the United States. It is plain, therefore, that this bill should not be enacted into law.

CHARLES W. TOBEY.

HOUSE JOINT RESOLUTION REFERRED

The joint resolution (H. J. Res. 140) to restore the name of Hoover Dam was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

PERSONAL STATEMENT—NOMINATION OF LEWIS W. DOUGLAS

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, on Wednesday last, during my absence from the Senate, the nomination of Lewis W. Douglas to be Ambassador to Great Britain came up for consideration in the Senate. At that time the majority leader very kindly inserted in the RECORD a statement of the fact that if I were present I would vote against confirming the nomination of Mr. Douglas to be Ambassador to Great Britain.

I wish to state briefly why I took that position. It is my belief that at this particular time the Ambassador to Great Britain above everything else should be an American citizen, a fighting American. I hold in my hand an article recently published in the New York Daily Mirror. One of the leading commentators said:

Douglas' grandfather was a Scottish professor of geology who migrated to Arizona via Canada, where he established the base of the Phelps-Dodge copper millions.

But, though the family is worth millions and Douglas, Ariz., is named for him, Grandpa Douglas refused to become a citizen. He sent his wife back to Canada whenever a child was expected, so all his children would be British subjects. Of his two sons, Walter Douglas remained British. Jim Douglas, Lew's father, fell in love with Josephine Williams, daughter of a miner, who refused to let his daughter marry a foreigner.

Because of this, Lew, to be Ambassador to Britain, happened to be born a United States citizen. But he kept close ties with Canada, was chancelor of McGill University, Montreal. His father, married to an American, went back to resume Canadian citizenship.

Some who wondered whether Douglas was Canadian or American wonder whether he will be another Walter H. Page, more British than the British, or stand up for the United States.

* * * * *

Shortly after VE-day, he turned up in Germany, for reasons known to himself and his brother-in-law, Jack McCloy, ex-assistant secretary. Why the civilian head of Mutual Life, close to the Morgans, should be in Germany when civilians were barred, hasn't been explained.

Mr. MCFARLAND. Mr. President, I very much regret that the loyalty of Lewis Douglas has been challenged in the United States Senate. Lew Douglas has had a long and honorable career as a statesman in the United States. He served in the First World War with distinction. He served as a Member of the House of Representatives from Arizona. He was President Roosevelt's appointee as Director of the Budget, and has filled important posts in our Government. Regardless of what one may think about his views, on the record his loyalty as an American citizen cannot be challenged.

I do not desire to take the time of the Senate to review his career and his service in behalf of our Government because they speak for themselves, but I do most sincerely regret that his worthiness for the post for which he has been nominated by President Truman has been questioned. I am certain that he is one of the able and outstanding American citizens of his time and that he will prove an able and conscientious Ambassador in these troublous times.

PERSONAL STATEMENT—THE RULE OF COMITY

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, it appears that I have injured the sensitivities and feelings of a very distinguished Democratic Member of the House of Representatives, Mr. RANKIN, of Mississippi, by introducing into the Appendix of the RECORD the other day an editorial that was published in the Washington Post entitled "Flouted Veterans." It referred to the objections raised by Congressman RANKIN when a representative of the AVC sought to testify before a House committee.

I would not, of course, think of injuring the sensitivity of Mr. RANKIN, or of any other Member of the Congress. I was not aware that there is apparently a so-called custom and practice of comity that calls upon us not to introduce in the RECORD any statements or editorials that criticize any other Member of Congress. Apparently the interpretation made of this editorial is that it is an unfair criticism. Of course, it will have to speak for itself, but under the practice of comity previously referred to, I am pleased to ask that the editorial be withdrawn from the permanent RECORD.

I am glad to find out about the rule, Mr. President. I did not know of its existence. I have some evidence that would support my innocence in the matter, because on April 3, 1946, not by way of publishing anything in the Appendix of the RECORD that somebody else wrote in the form of an editorial, but, in a very interesting speech on the floor of the House, another distinguished Member of the House of Representatives, a gentleman by the name of Mr. CLARE E. HOFFMAN, paid his disrespects to me and questioned my Republicanism. He judged my Republicanism, of course, on the basis of his conceptions of Republicanism. I surmise there is some difference between his and mine. I thought that the Representative from Michigan had the right to make that speech, and I would not take that right away from him, because I believe in free speech, and without limitations upon it, even on the floor of the Congress.

I assume that Mr. HOFFMAN does not know about this custom of comity. However, it is perfectly all right with me for him to make all the speeches about me that he wants to, as can anybody else—but my innocence about the comity practice is portrayed by the fact that I knew of the speech of Mr. HOFFMAN'S, which I considered it his right to make, although highly critical of me. Of course, I think that any Member of the House who wants to question my Republicanism is welcome to do it, because I am perfectly willing to let the Republican voters of Oregon decide on my brand of Republicanism.

But, Mr. President, to show how fair I want to be about these things, I wish to refer to a two-page mimeographed statement of criticism of me written by another distinguished Member of the House, Representative PAUL W. SHAFER, Republican, of Michigan. I do not have any doubt about the fact that he is a Republican, representing a certain Republican point of view, and I represent another Republican point of view. In this mimeographed statement he pays his disrespects to me, and I think it is such interesting reading—and I have been informed by the Parliamentarian that the request I am about to make does not violate any rule of comity—that I am going to ask unanimous consent to have Mr. SHAFER'S opinion of me, as set forth in this two-page mimeographed statement, published in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATEMENT BY REPRESENTATIVE PAUL SHAFER, REPUBLICAN, OF MICHIGAN

Like most of my colleagues, I hesitate to get in public quarrels with members of either the House or Senate, but one of our former colleagues here has been subject to such ridiculous attacks that I feel keenly I must reply to his tormentor.

I refer to the perfectly ridiculous and asinine assertions that have been made by WAYNE MORSE, the so-called Republican from Oregon, on B. Carroll Reece, a long-time and honored Member of the House and now chairman of the Republican National Committee.

It has been galling to most Republicans of my acquaintance that WAYNE MORSE ever should have called himself a Republican in the first place. And I might add that my acquaintance includes a number of Senators, Representatives, and quite a few voters who were Republicans and were supporting Republicans for office when WAYNE MORSE was a chore boy for the New Deal.

The basis for the attack on B. Carroll Reece by WAYNE MORSE hardly could have been called inflammatory by any intelligent and sensible Republican, or, for that matter, by a political figure of either party. Mr. Reece simply wrote an editorial for the Republican News calling on us who are Members of Congress for more team play so that our program might be put through with a minimum of friction.

Is there anything dishonorable about asking for team play in the Congress in the United States?

Did he make any threats about withholding patronage from any Republicans who failed to cooperate? Is there one other Republican who can say sincerely that he found one phrase in Mr. Reece's editorial which could be interpreted by any sane man as being biased or as being unfair to all members of the Republican Party?

The obvious answers to these questions is "No."

The only point to Carroll Reece's statement was a gentle urging for us Republicans to stand together to work for a legislative program which we promised the people we would enact.

Taking this plea by the elected head of the Republican National Committee, WAYNE MORSE, in his tricky and suspicious mind, interpreted it as a personal attack. It is highly doubtful that Carroll ever even thought of WAYNE MORSE at the time he was composing the editorial.

MORSE called Reece an agent of the "Republican reactionaries." He went on with some other of his own particular brand of double-talk in which he uses words that have meanings that can be interpreted 15 ways from yesterday by everyone who reads them. I want the Republicans of the United States to know that when Carroll Reece speaks, he speaks for a vast majority of his former colleagues in the House of Representatives and for the most of the Republican Senators in the Senate of the United States. I believe also that he speaks for the millions of Americans who have watched and waited for 14 long years while this Government was being wrecked. During those years, the so-called Republican from Oregon, WAYNE MORSE, was working hand-in-glove with the New Dealers and was helping to perpetuate the same policies against which the overwhelming number of Republicans were working.

WAYNE MORSE speaks for himself. He has the right to speak for himself. But as far as I am concerned, and I believe I speak for millions of Republicans, he has no right to speak as a Republican, because he is nothing in the world but another New Dealer of the Wallace stripe. As a matter of fact, I sometimes think that MORSE is the New Deal secret weapon among the Republicans. He could well be a creature of Wallace himself. Wallace, you know, discovered hybrid corn. WAYNE MORSE is a hybrid New Dealer and we might find that he is just another kind of hybrid corn. He has the tassel around his mouth.

As the chairman of the subcommittee of the Armed Services Committee, I know that WAYNE MORSE has fed the people another batch of illogic by saying that the Republican majority wants to sell our international obligations and to sell national defense short.

In every newspaper in which WAYNE MORSE'S statement against Reece and the other millions of so-called "Reactionary Republicans" appeared, there was a notice that President Truman himself had said that he would not ask for extension of the draft. The Army, itself, by so urging the President, has admitted that we are no longer in the emergency period that was kept in effect for propaganda reasons for so long after the war. The truth is, we have not cut the military as much as we should have cut it and I serve notice now that next year we are really going to get down to making some whacks. We cannot afford to waste billions of dollars o an outmoded and static military machine. We could afford better to offer a free scholarship to every boy and girl in the United States who wanted to study science and to learn new methods of scientific ingenuity and progress, for any war in which we engage again will be a war of science and we will win it or lose it because of the caliber of the intelligence of the millions of our citizens.

As far as I am concerned, I am willing to let WAYNE MORSE make his demagogic and wholly unsound statements, but I want to make it crystal clear that he speaks for no other Republican of my acquaintance anywhere in the United States.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, in view of the fact that apparently I have injured the sensitivity of Mr. RANKIN, I ask to have the editorial of the Washington Post of February 19 withdrawn from the permanent files of the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the request of the Senator from Oregon is granted.

Mr. MORSE. I close, Mr. President, by asking unanimous consent to have published in the body of the RECORD an article of mine which was published in last Sunday's Oregonian. It sets forth some of my views as to international problems that I think face us, based upon some observations I made during the course of a 6 weeks' trip through Europe and the Middle East last fall.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SENATORIAL WARNING: UNITED STATES MUST NOT RELAX—WAYNE MORSE, OF OREGON, SEES THREAT OF WORLD WAR III UNLESS AMERICANS CONVINCED OF THEIR RESPONSIBILITIES

(By WAYNE MORSE, United States Senator from Oregon)

Forty-two days, just 6 weeks, is a very short time in which to make observations in France, Germany, Austria, Italy, Greece, Egypt, Palestine, Lebanon, England, and Scotland. When such a trip is broken down into the principal cities visited during that short period of time the miracle of modern transportation facilities by airplane, train, and car becomes even more marvelous to comprehend, let alone experience.

Paris, Frankfurt, Berlin, Wiesbaden, Munich, Berchtesgaden, Nuremberg, Salzburg, Vienna, Wels, Marseille, Rome, Naples, Sorrento, Athens, Cairo, Jerusalem, Tel Aviv, Beirut, London, Glasgow, and Edinburgh, plus many intervening countryside towns, were the principal municipal stops on the map that dotted the itinerary of my recent observation tour.

Time is never ample on such a bird's-eye flight to make an intensive study of anything. Yet it is remarkable how much time one really does have on such a journey to make many careful observations if he travels alone and devotes his full time to working at the job of looking at and hearing about the problems of war and peace in Europe and Middle East. One finishes such a trip knowing full well that it has not provided him with any of the answers to the many complex, unsolved aftermath problems of World War II. At the same time, such a trip makes crystal clear that unless those problems are solved quickly in accordance with the principles of the Atlantic Charter and in keeping with the objectives of the United Nations Charter, the horrors of World War III will not even wait to victimize our grandchildren.

Wherever one goes in Europe he sees that the struggle for peace is being carried on against great odds. Germany and Italy are thoroughly beaten nations. Their people are more than beaten to their knees; they are prostrate in defeat. City after city bombed into ruins, the highways and countryside still showing the debris of defeated armies and disorganized retreat. Bridges gone, railroads crippled, resources of productive employment destroyed, all present the victor with stunning and frightful evidence of the destructive force of modern warfare.

You remember our saying when we went into this war that this time we would give the Germans a full dose of their own medicine and teach them what it means to suffer defeat. Well, we did that and more, too. We taught them that our terms of unconditional surrender meant total national prostration, and we taught it to the Italians, too. There is no doubt about our German and Italian enemies knowing that they were defeated. Likewise, there is no doubt that the complete defeat which the Allies dealt them was both deserved and necessary if the rest of the world was to save itself from being crushed by the iron pincers of fascism.

However, the American people, devoted to the ideals for peace, have yet to learn that the total military defeat of our enemies did not result automatically in winning the peace. The peace is far from won. It will be a long time in the winning because even the signing of peace treaties, no matter how fair and just their terms may be, will still mean years of work ahead for the Allies and the other United Nations to perform in perfecting the peace and keeping it won.

As one looks at the faces of the people of Europe and sees registered there the daze of defeat, the sullen bitterness of resentment, the fear of the future, and the suffering of hunger and pain, he sees more clearly that the military defeat of our enemies is not synonymous with peace. Rather he feels that the people of Europe for the most part are acting today on the basis of instincts rather than as rational beings. Their consuming interest is to secure enough to eat, enough clothes to wear, and some form of shelter in order to keep alive. Many of them are failing in that instinctive struggle for survival. Few of them have time or energy even to think about the clash of ideologies that has produced their defeat. They are not ready to do the necessary rethinking on social and political objectives which they must do before they can be entrusted safely with any of the responsibilities of peace. That is going to take years, but first we must not forget that hungry people, faced with a future of many years of economic deprivations, cannot be expected to show much interest in our theories of peace.

GERMANS STILL PREFER NAZI TYPE OF GOVERNMENT

They find no sustenance in the phrases of political ideologies of either communism or of democracy. In fact, wherever I went in Germany and carried on any prolonged discussion with Germans representing a cross section of the German population, I found that the preference for the totalitarian form of government of the Nazi type is deeply embedded in the thinking of the German people. Thus in a variety of language forms, the views expressed to me in all parts of Germany by all age groups and by all types and classes of people, irrespective of economic status or education, were that what Germany needs is a new leader—a good leader. They would always hasten to make clear to me that Hitler was a bad leader. He and his gang failed the people. They misled and deceived the people. If only they had been good leaders, Germany would have won the war.

I was disappointed and disturbed to discover that apparently the mass of people in Germany still do not see that what Germany needs is not a new leader but new leaders—men and women selected from the ranks of all classes of the people to represent and lead them into the channels of self-government, economic stability, and peace.

How naive I was, before I went to Germany, to believe that the war certainly would teach that lesson to the German people. I overlooked that that lesson is the lesson of democracy and the Germans simply do not understand self-government because they have been conditioned to the ways of authoritarian government and the iron rule of men who hold dictatorial power over them. It will take many years to lead younger generations of Germans into the paths of self-government, but until that is done the war in Europe will not be over and the peace will not be won.

I am afraid that, given the resources and complete freedom of action, the German people would wage war again just as soon as possible.

Thus of the many impressions which hammered their mark upon my senses as I moved about through the misery, suffering, intrigue, and hates of Europe, none cut deeper into my consciousness than the realization that the war is not over. Only the large-scale armed hostility is over. Only wishful-thinking Americans at home think the war is over. Unless the statesmen of our country have the political courage to tell the American people the unpleasant facts about world conditions today and educate them into an understanding of the importance of America remaining not only strong in its forces of defense and security, but also in maintaining its full share of surveillance responsibilities in Europe, the-war-is-over attitude of the American people will sentence our children, rather than our grandchildren, to the tortures and punishment of another war. We cannot even give those children any assurance that those among them who survive that war will have the opportunity, as victors, to establish a world order of permanent peace. Such an opportunity is now ours as victors in this war, thanks to the gallantry of our armed forces and the war-production record of our civilians on the home front. It must not be overlooked that the chances are better than even that there will be no victors in the next war except the victory of chaos.

If every Member of Congress could see Europe today; if hundreds of the leaders and molders of American public opinion could walk among the ruins of Europe; if thousands of our American citizens could only take a look at war-wrecked Europe as she is today, the dangerous trend in America of assuming that the war is over and of relaxing into the comforts of our own economic well-being would end abruptly. Only tragedy lies ahead if the American people come to think that they can follow a course of national economic isolationism, while most of the people of the rest of the world see the Atlantic Charter only as a mirage. After one looks at the ravages of modern war and comprehends the twisted ideologies that are taking root in the thinking of people abroad, he comes away from it all realizing more than ever that time is truly of the essence in winning the peace. He knows that the American people would not fail in their responsibilities of winning that peace if only they could be made to see and understand the dangers inherent in failing to give much more adequate support to our military government and State Department programs abroad.

There is certainly a great need to mobilize all the educational resources of America into a program presenting a factual, realistic picture of world conditions as they actually exist today. The American people must be led to see that there can be neither long-lasting economic prosperity at home nor international security for us abroad until a fair and just peace is both won and implemented. They do not like to hear that winning such a peace is going to cost us some sacrifices. For instance, they prefer to hear their politicians tell them that they can have drastic tax reductions and peace, too.

Our people want to believe the demagogs who would fool them into thinking that we fulfilled all of our responsibilities and obligations in the war when we made the terrific sacrifices of men and resources in defeating the military forces of our enemies. They don't like to face up to the painful fact that our military victory has only given us an opportunity to build a one-world system of permanent peace. Confronted with a tremendous war debt, harassed by many internal economic difficulties and fearful of a possible depression, it is easy to understand why many Americans are a little short of patience with those who point out that winning the peace is a matter of years and will cost substantial economic sacrifices on the part of the United States as well as of other nations which have so much to lose in another war.

Many of our people do not like to be told that no matter how much the peace costs us it is cheap at any price compared with the cost of another war. They are resisting thinking the problem through and seem to prefer to take their chances in avoiding another war rather than facing reality and the necessity of paying whatever it takes to win the peace if we are to have any peace.

Too many of the old patterns of emotional thinking which characterized American public opinion in the years immediately following the First World War are again in evidence in our country. Thus heavy pressure is being placed upon Members of Congress to withdraw our forces from Europe, to cripple our military government and foreign service by denying them adequate appropriation, to cut drastically Federal taxes even at the risk of cheapening the value of the American dollar, and to allow selfish groups in America such freedom from reasonable Government controls as to enable them once again to exploit human beings for profit dollars. Make no mistake about it, such presure groups are doing the work of isolationists in disguise and they are selling short the next generation of Americans.

AMERICANS WORK FOR SELVES INSTEAD OF PEACE

It is quite understandable, but nevertheless very sad and unfortunate, that so many of our people are devoting more attention to the pursuit of selfish economic interest than of permanent peace. The old American pastimes of believing what we want to believe, of passing the buck, of blaming the politicians for our national ills, and of rationalizing our selfishness are once again discoloring American public opinion.

However, indulgence in wishful thinking, no matter how psychologically comforting and pleasant it may seem to be, constitutes in fact a betrayal of those of our own national flesh and blood who died that we might have an opportunity to win the peace. They did not die in order that selfish individuals could make huge profits out of the economic dislocations, at home and abroad, which are always some of the economic results of war. They did not die in order to provide an opportunity for economic groups in America to carry on an internal conflict over wages, prices, profits, and selfish economic aspirations.

When they died they thought the American people were united in the determination to see to it that a one-world order of permanent peace resulted from their sacrifice. Possibly they overlooked the fact that it is human nature for people to forget pain, once they cease to experience it, until injury is inflicted upon them again. Nevertheless, we who survived the war have no right to commercialize the sacrifices of those who died. We have the clear obligation to subordinate our international economic interests to the winning of the peace which certainly has yet to be won.

Someway, somehow, the American people must be made to understand that even from the standpoint of our children's best economic interests we cannot afford to let the seeds of war be resown in Europe. My trip abroad convinced me that war will engulf the world again if we continue to weaken our position in Europe. Already we have lost prestige and influence in Europe, chiefly because of the fact that we have left our devoted public servants, in charge of military government and foreign affairs over there, so understaffed and lacking in adequate facilities with which to carry on their work that many of the objectives have been impossible of accomplishment.

We not only have failed to give our military leaders in Europe adequate military and civilian personnel to do many of the things that need to be done, if our occupation program is to be successful, but too frequently we have weakened their standing abroad by unfair and unsupportable criticisms here at home. Would that some of those critics, including those people who, without examination of the facts, have accepted the misrepresentations of the critics, could be required to face the problems of military government and the security problems which have confronted some of our military leaders in Europe.

On the basis of my observation and study of their work I wish to pay my respects to, and express my confidence in, the great service which has been rendered to the American people by such generals as McNarney, Clay, Keating, Mueller, Lewis, Clark, Collins, Jaynes, Lee, and the other military leaders who have been entrusted with the task of administering the foreign-affairs policies of our Government in the conquered and liberated countries of Europe.

They have demonstrated for history in a manner unequaled by any other occupying forces, in this or any other war, what it means to take over a country as victors and not as oppressors. Their work in Europe coupled with the great work of MacArthur in Japan, has clearly demonstrated that we fought the war for peace and not for selfish gain; that we fought the war to establish in the world the principles of the Atlantic Charter to be implemented in keeping with the objectives and procedures of the United Nations.

These great leaders have done a magnificent job in carrying out the bipartisan foreign-affairs policies of our Government as worked out by our President, his advisers, and the Congress. All of our military generals and officials who have had the great responsibility of directing the affairs of our occupational forces on foreign soil have had the benefit of the cooperation and policy-making leadership of three great Cabinet officers whose duties and responsibilities are directly related to our military government abroad—Secretary of State Byrnes, Secretary of War Patterson, and Secretary of the Navy Forrestal.

The empty-headedness of most of their critics becomes manifestly clear when one goes to Europe and sees first-hand the many difficulties which confront our American officials, both those in the military and in the Foreign Service. Many of the difficulties are the direct result of our failure to give these officials sufficient numbers of seasoned and competent help. Take, for example, the problems of military security in Germany. We have reduced our military forces to a constabulary basis which, in numbers, would not be sufficient to put down any well-organized revolt among the German people. That has had its effect both on psychological attitudes in Germany and in securing the necessary cooperation from the German people in carrying out our program.

FORCE MUST BE KEPT UP IN GERMAN NATION

We Americans do not understand German attitudes because under our political system of individual freedom and liberty we have never experienced the evil effects of regimentation upon the individual. However, we should not forget that Germany is a police state in the sense that the individual German has become conditioned to the controls of military force and gestapo police methods. He is quick to detect weakness and lack of sufficient power to enforce a program of military order. It is certainly true that we do not want to perpetuate in Germany a police state, but it is most unrealistic to think that German attitudes can be changed overnight or that we can withdraw military forces from Germany as quickly as we have and are withdrawing them and still maintain security and peace in Germany.

The too rapid depletion of our military forces in Germany has not only created a serious security problem, insofar as our American personnel in Germany is concerned, but it also has weakened our ability to protect the lives and property of racial minority groups in Germany as well as of those too few Germans who see the importance of democratizing the new Germany.

The security situation has been made worse by sending to Germany, as military replacements, 18- and 19 year-old boys, who for the most part, are completely lacking in both the necessary military training and the maturity required for the work of occupational forces. Many of these boys have had only a few weeks of military training and the impression which they make on the German people is not favorable. Then, too, the experiences which many of these young boys are having in their relations with the German population are not good for them either from the standpoint of good character building or good citizenship. They should be replaced with older men, carefully selected for the duties of an occupational army service; soldiers who should be given comparable standing to Government employees who perform civilian work in our military government abroad.

Our military leaders in Europe should not be criticized because of any problems that arise from sending young, immature boys to serve in the occupational army in Germany. We here at home are the ones to be criticized because we are responsible for it in that we have not given to the War Department the support it needs if a better quality army is to serve abroad.

Further, it should be mentioned that any realistic approach to our occupational job in Europe should cause us to recognize that our program has been greatly handicapped because of the fear, which I found wherever I went, that the Americans cannot be counted upon to stay in Europe for very long. That fear has slowed up cooperation with us on the part of German people and undoubtedly it has had its effect, for example, on the denazification program in Germany. It is very easy for us to put pressure upon German civilian officials to carry on more rapidly an effective denazification program, but we should not overlook the fact that nazism and a totalitarian philosophy is far from dead in Germany. For the most part it has only been driven underground where it is smoldering and simmering preparatory to an eruption if we withdraw from Germany before the Germans are habituated to the ways of self-government. It is only natural that the German anti-Nazi should ask himself, "What will happen to me if the Americans withdraw from Germany in the next few years or so weaken their forces over here that they cannot protect me and my family from Nazi groups which at the present time have simply gone underground?" Thus from the standpoint of the objective of democratizing Germany the all too rapid withdrawal of adequate military forces in Germany has been one of our major blunders.

ANTI-NAZIS FEEL UNITED STATES FORCES WEAKENED TOO MUCH

I talked to many German workers, to former trade-union officials, to businessmen, teachers, farmers, and other classes of German individuals who belong to the anti-Nazi division of the German population. They uniformly expressed to me their great concern about what will happen to them if the Americans should withdraw from Germany too soon. They told me that from the standpoint of internal security in Germany we had already weakened our military strength far too much. They told me something else, and that was that although the German people, as a population, have no love for America, because they recognize that if we had not come into the war they would have won it, nevertheless they fear and dislike Russia even more. There is not a doubt that a certain fear prevails throughout Germany—the fear that if we withdraw from Europe, Germany will fall under the domination and control of Russia. The unanimity of that point of view among the Germans is so complete that we cannot afford to ignore it in determining our European policy.

The Russians have not made the mistake of weakening their military strength in Europe. It certainly is to be hoped that the Moscow conference in March will result in some agreement on the number of military forces to be maintained by the Allies in the conquered countries. The fact now is that Russia is maintaining very large military forces in her zones in Europe and that fact, accompanied by her harsh economic policies and her iron-curtain barrier imposed in the Russian-occupied territories, has not been conducive to the spreading of a peace psychology in Europe.

I am not one of those who believe that war with Russia is inevitable. In fact, I think it can and must be avoided through our insistence that issues of international misunderstanding, when they arise, shall be settled through the procedures of the United Nations Charter and in keeping with our agreements entered into with Russia and the other allies. However, one cannot observe Russia's policies in Europe today without recognizing that she must make considerable modifications in her tactics and policies if she is to quiet the fears and suspicions that her own conduct is building up against her. Her iron-curtain policy cannot be reconciled, at least in the thinking of occidental minds, with a spirit of friendly cooperation and good-faith intentions to help build a world power of permanent peace.

I have yet to hear any reasonable explanation of the exaggerated national modesty on the part of Russia which causes her to shut herself in from international observations by dropping the iron curtain along her border. The degree to which she has carried this iron-curtain policy, even in Russian occupied zones in Europe, is perfectly fantastic. As a result, many lips of all nationalities are asking the questions: "What is it that Russia is trying to conceal?" "What is it that she doesn't want us to see?" Oh, yes, occasionally, either by chance or design, a few individuals from the allied countries are allowed to go to Moscow by way of conducted tours through narrow corridors of entry and exit. However, for the most part, in the case of Russia, the world is treated to the spectacle of a great power whose leaders talk in terms of disarmament and peace but who at the same time maintain a rigid censorship over the news, a rigid military policing system over conquered territory and a rigid iron curtain at its borders.

It is difficult to understand how Russia can be a signatory to the San Francisco Charter and thereby underwrite the bill of human rights set forth in that Charter and at the same time follow such a strongly nationalistic and isolationistic policy in relation to her allies. How much easier it would be to work out the terms of peace and develop fine relations with Russia free of any basis of suspicion if she would open the doors of her country on the basis of reciprocity to any visiting nations of the world. How much easier it would be to develop friendly understanding of Russian policies and problems if she welcomed within her borders on a reciprocal basis newspapermen of other nations free of censorship restrictions.

When I was in England, I talked to a member of the British Labor Party who last summer was favored by the Russian Government by receiving permission to visit certain parts of Russia. He said that although his trip through Russia was circumscribed by many restrictions, nevertheless he felt that if Russia could only be made to see the wisdom of opening up her country to international travel, it not only would greatly strengthen her economic position in the world but would remove from her the cloud of international fear and suspicion that now hangs over her.

He said that he suspected that part of the explanation of Russia's "iron-curtain" policy is that her leaders are somewhat sensitive about the hardships that many of the Russian people have to live under. For example, he stated that at least 6,000,000 Russian people are homeless because the devastations of war have produced a great housing shortage. Standards of living for many of them are very low, and the economic struggle which lies ahead for the people of Russia is a very rugged one compared with the more favorable conditions of people in many other parts of the world, such as in the United States. However, as he put it, and I agree with him, there would be a very great desire on the part of the nations of the world generally to help Russia solve her problems if she were more willing to follow a policy of neighborliness.

Many of us in public office are perfectly willing in the interest of laying lasting foundations of peace to lean over backward in an endeavor to cooperate with Russia. We are trying to understand her point of view and the basis for whatever suspicions she may entertain toward our country. However, we find it very difficult to figure out many of her policies and to reconcile them with the conduct of a friendly ally that is seeking peace.

As one travels through Europe today he is constantly bumping up against some arbitrary action, unilateral in character, initiated by the Russians, which causes continual misunderstanding and frequently ill will. For example, when one lands in an American airplane at the airport just a few miles outside of Vienna he is surprised to learn that it will take him about an hour and 15 minutes to drive into the city. He is told that the direct and main highway would take between 20 and 30 minutes, but the Russians refuse to permit the airport traffic to take the direct route. Instead, one is required to drive over a round-about road for an hour and a quarter before reaching Vienna. I was unable to find any official in Vienna who could give me any reasonable explanation of the reason lying back of this annoying Russian policy that causes no small inconvenience to our officials in Vienna.

Likewise, in this section of Europe, the Russians have been very arbitrary in regard to the airway-corridor regulations and restrictions which they have imposed upon American planes. It took us about an hour longer to fly from Vienna to Rome through the corridor that the Russians required us to travel than it need take if the Russians were less arbitary about the matter and permitted our planes to follow a more direct route. I mention these as examples only of the little incidents that certainly are not promoting the best of cooperative relations between the Russians and the other allies in Europe.

Each one of these little incidents standing alone is not of great significance, but when multiplied by many such incidents their cumulative effect helps produce the war of nerves developing in Europe.

RUSSIANS ABUSE VETO POWER IN COMMITTEE WORK

Then, of course, there are bigger issues. One only has to sit in at any of the meetings of the four-power unanimous-rule-coordinating committees charged with the responsibility of determining allied policies in the occupied countries to see what importance Russia places upon the veto power. Maybe as time goes on the Russians will come to recognize that their allies are acting in good faith and therefore refrain from such a frequent use of the veto as now characterizes their conduct on such committees. Maybe they will come to understand the importance of give-and-take compromises between and among the allies if we are to administer the conquered countries in the interest of a just and lasting peace. However, certainly to date there is no denying the record that the Russians have used the veto as an instrument of negativism and as a means of establishing what amounts, in many instances, to rule by the minority.

Anti-American propaganda published by the communistic papers in the various Russian zones of influence is one of the major sources of misunderstanding and suspicion in Europe. Personally, I do not think that Americans should be too sensitive about such propaganda, although it certainly is not indicative of the conduct of a cooperative ally. Possibly, if we patiently protected freedom of the press in our zones, even though a reciprocal freedom is not allowed in the Russian zone, in due course of time the Russian leaders will come to recognize our good faith and fairness and cease printing and broadcasting their misrepresentations about America.

Of course, I think that we in this country should never forget what apparently those within our country who have been criticizing the Truman-Byrnes-Vandenberg-Connally foreign policy seem to have forgotten, namely, that Russia is a police state in the true sense. She is a state which is just as totalitarian in her basic principles of operation as any form of totalitarianism can be, whether you call it fascism or communism. In such a state arbitrary rule and the finality of dictatorial judgment is all-controlling. Any hesitation to accept the decision of those in power results in a very effective policing of one degree or another.

Hence, if one keeps that basic difference between the Russian system of government and our system of personal freedom in America in mind, it becomes clear why we must be exceedingly patient in our international deliberations with the Russians in the hope that they will come to appreciate somewhat better the sincerity of our friendly motives toward them. However, at the same time let us not be so soft, nor so short-sighted, nor so foolhardy as to overlook the imperative importance of our being firm in seeing to it that the objectives of permanent peace, for which we fought the war and assisted in creating the United Nations, are not endangered by any misinterpretations on the part of Russia of our determined intention to see to it that the peace is maintained.

ADDRESS BY THE PRESIDENT ON RECEIVING HONORARY DEGREE OF DOCTOR OF LAWS

LEAVE OF ABSENCE

Mr. MARTIN. Mr. President, I ask consent to be absent from the Senate until Tuesday afternoon.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, consent of the Senate is granted.

THE PRESIDENTIAL TERM

The Senate resumed the consideration of the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 27) providing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States relating to the terms of office of the President.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the first committee amendment, which will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 1, line 6, after the word "by", it is proposed to strike out "the legislatures of three-fourths of the several States" and insert "conventions in the several States, as provided in the Constitution."

Mr. HILL. Mr. President, the pending amendment to the Constitution would place the wisdom of the people in a strait-jacket. It would be a limitation on their right of free election. No matter what the emergency or what the danger, no matter how strongly the people might wish to continue a man in the Presidency, at the end of his second term they would be prohibited from doing so. The proposed amendment to the Constitution would place in the Constitution a rigid prohibition against the right of the people to reelect a man at the end of his second term. There is a vast difference between a rigid prohibition in the Constitution, absolutely denying such a right to the people, and a custom under which the people ordinarily do not exercise the right. I have no disagreement with the custom of ordinarily electing our Presidents for not more than two terms. The custom is well and good in customary times to meet ordinary conditions, but the difficulty about the proposed amendment is that once this rigid prohibition is imposed on the people, they are absolutely bound by it until and unless, at some future date, the Constitution is again amended and the rigid prohibition removed.

We all know the difficulties attendant upon amending the Constitution. We realize what a long, slow, and tedious process it is. No man can possibly know what the future holds; no man can know what tomorrow may bring forth, what dangers there may be for our country, what emergencies the Nation may face. Who, standing on this floor 10 years ago, could have foreseen the momentous and revolutionary events which have occurred in the history of the United States and of the world during the past 10 years? When we contemplate the world today and recall what it was like 10 years ago we can readily realize how violent and revolutionary have been the changes. We are accustomed to think we live in the air age. Yet the world is moving forward so rapidly that before we have passed out of the adolescence of the air age we find ourselves in the atomic age.

Within the past week many of us have been shocked by the revelations of conditions in Greece and Turkey, by the challenge of certain obligations and duties resting upon our country in those far-away lands which perhaps most of us had not even considered. Only a few days ago even so wise and level-headed and able a Member of this body as the distinguished junior Senator from Georgia [Mr. RUSSELL] suggested that constituent members of the United Kingdom, England, Wales, Scotland, and Ireland be admitted into the American Union as States. This shows, Mr. President, how uncertain conditions are in the world today, and it suggests that many of the old moorings and the old landmarks seem to have disappeared. No one, I repeat, can know what may lie ahead of us or what danger or emergency may confront our Nation in the days ahead. Why then, should we suggest writing into the Constitution of the United States a rigid prohibition which might prevent the American people from meeting a danger or an emergency as they in their wisdom may think best?

Mr. President during the history of our country approximately 170 joint resolutions have been introduced, either in this body or in the House of Representatives proposing to limit the term of office of the President. No one of those resolutions has ever been able to command sufficient support on the part of the people of the United States to be passed by the necessary votes in both Houses of Congress. Why should we now, at this late date, after more than 150 years of our history under the Constitution, submit such a rigid prohibition for incorporation into the Constitution?

When we speak of a third term we think of George Washington, our first President, because it is said that he set the custom, that he established the precedent of a President's serving only two terms in office. Washington spoke very directly on the question of the wisdom of placing such a limitation on the people and the free election of their President. On April 28, 1788, he wrote a letter to the Marquis de Lafayette in which he spoke of the Constitutional Convention having given most careful consideration to this question, and of having finally come to the conclusion that there should be no limit on the people's right in the matter of the election of their President. Washington closed his letter to the Marquis de Lafayette with these words:

> Under an extended view of this part of the subject I can see no propriety in precluding ourselves from the service of any man who, in some great emergency, shall be deemed universally most capable of serving the public.

That was George Washington speaking 170 years ago. It illustrates the wisdom of Washington. He did not foresee the air age or the atomic age. He did not even foresee the railroads, the telegraph, the telephone, or any of the other inventions which have made the world one common neighborhood; but in his wisdom he foresaw that a great emergency might arise in which the people might wish to continue a man in office. So he said he saw no propriety in limiting the people in their right to meet an emergency as they deemed wisest and best.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. HILL. I yield.

Mr. LUCAS. The fact that George Washington refused a third term has been referred to as evidence that Washington was opposed to anyone serving a third term. I think the able Senator will agree with me that that is an inaccurate conclusion.

Mr. HILL. It is a wholly inaccurate conclusion. Not one word, not one expression, is to be found in George Washington's statements or his writings against a President serving more than two terms. On the contrary, there is the express opinion which I have just read to the Senate. Anyone who has studied the history of George Washington should know that the principal reason stated in his Farewell Address for his not even considering a third term was a personal reason. He had been in command of the Continental Army for 7 or 8 years; he had been away from his beloved Mount Vernon; he had served 8 years as President; and the desire closest to his heart was to retire from public service, to be relieved of the burdens and labors of public office, and return to his beautiful acres at Mount Vernon.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, will the Senator further yield?

Mr. HILL. I yield.

Mr. LUCAS. It is accurate to say that he rejected a third term for the reasons stated by the Senator from Alabama, but it is wholly inaccurate to say that George Washington ever opposed the principle or the wisdom of anyone's being reelected to a third term.

Mr. HILL. The Senator is exactly correct. In that connection I shall not take the time of the Senate to read from Washington's Farewell Address. It was very eloquently read here only a few days ago by the distinguished Senator from West Virginia [Mr. REVERCOMB]; but I ask that at this point I may include in the RECORD an excerpt from the Farewell Address, which states very clearly that Washington did not desire a third term because he earnestly wished to retire; he devoutly wished to be relieved of the burdens of public service.

There being no objection, the excerpt was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

> The period for a new election of a citizen to administer the executive government of the United States being not far distant, and the time actually arrived when your thoughts must be employed in designating the person who is to be clothed with that important trust, it appears to me proper, especially as it may conduce to a more distinct expression of the public voice, that I should now apprise you of the resolution I have formed, to decline being considered among the number of those out of whom a choice is to be made.
> I beg you, at the same time, to do me the justice to be assured, that this resolution has not been taken without a strict regard to all the considerations appertaining to the relation which binds a dutiful citizen to his country; and that, in withdrawing the tender of service which silence in my situation might imply, I am influenced by no diminution of zeal for your future interest; no deficiency of grateful respect for your past kindness; but am supported by a full conviction that the step is compatible with both.
> The acceptance of and continuance hitherto in the office to which your suffrages have twice called me have been a uniform sacrifice of inclination to the opinion of duty, and to a deference for what appeared to be your desire. I constantly hoped that it would have been much earlier in my power, consistently with motives which I was not at liberty to disregard, to return to that retirement from which I had been reluctantly drawn. The strength of my inclination to do this, previous to the last election, had even led to the preparation of an address to declare it to you; but mature reflection on the then perplexed and critical posture of our affairs with foreign nations, and the unanimous advice of persons entitled to my confidence, impelled me to abandon the idea.
> I rejoice that the state of your concerns, external as well as internal, no longer renders the pursuit of inclination incompatible with the sentiment of duty or propriety; and am persuaded, whatever partiality may be retained for my services, that in the present circumstances of our country, you will not disapprove my determination to retire.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, will the Senator further yield?

Mr. HILL. I yield.

Mr. LUCAS. I think history shows that George Washington did not desire even a second term.

Mr. HILL. The Senator is exactly correct. George Washington was willing to serve for a second term only because of the conditions then existing in Europe. Men highly placed in the Government and men influential throughout the country appealed to him, in view of the situation in Europe, to continue in office for a second term; and George Washington agreed to serve for a second term only because of his sense of duty to his country.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, will the Senator further yield to me?

Mr. HILL. I yield.

Mr. LUCAS. While the Senator from Alabama is discussing the first President of the United States I wish to call the attention of the Senate, as well as the attention of the country, to a further fact, which, of course, the Senator from Alabama may later include in his remarks: George Washington was the President of the Constitutional Convention and presided over that Convention throughout its deliberations. He heard all the arguments, both pro and con; and I think the record shows that during all that time he never entered into the debate either on one side or the other; but, of course, he finally voted with the majority on that question.

Mr. HILL. Mr. President, the Senator from Illinois is exactly correct. Furthermore, in his letter to the Marquis de Lafayette, George Washington referred to this matter and made clear that his position regarding it was the one I have stated.

Mr. President, neither can there be any doubt as to how this question evolved in the Constitutional Convention. As the Senator from Illinois well knows, it was first suggested that there be a limit on the length of service of any President—namely, one term of 7 years—but that he be elected by the National Legislature, in other words, by the Congress. However, the more the framers of the Constitution thought about the matter, the more they debated it, and the more thoroughly they explored it, the more definitely they came to the conclusion that the President should not be elected by the National Legislature, and that there should be no limit on his term of office.

It is interesting to know, as we all do, that under the will of the people of the United States, the election of the President has for many years been, not by the electoral college, but by the people themselves. The people themselves have asserted their right to elect their President.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. HILL. I yield.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Much has been said about the precedent set by George Washington. While my colleague is speaking about it, I should like to inquire whether it is true that in his Farewell Address, George Washington mentioned the fact that at the end of his first term he had actually prepared a farewell address, intending to give up the office at that time, but that he was prevailed upon to accept a second term because of the troubled conditions then existing? Is it not also true that at the end of his second term those conditions had cleared up to such an extent that he felt free to ask the people to relieve him; and did he not make the definite statement that patriotism did not forbid his taking that course?

Mr. HILL. The Senator is exactly correct. He accepted a second term only because of what he felt was the compulsion of duty to his country. He did not wish to have a second term.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Certainly it is fair to draw the inference from what he said there that had those conditions continued to exist at the end of his second term, he would have accepted a third term.

Mr. HILL. He practically said as much in his letter to the Marquis de Lafayette.

Mr. SPARKMAN. And he also indicated it in his Farewell Address.

Mr. HILL. Yes; he did in both his Farewell Address and in his letter to the Marquis de Lafayette.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. KNOWLAND in the chair). Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. HILL. I yield.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Inasmuch as the Senator from Alabama has been discussing George Washington's Farewell Address, let me inquire whether he recalls what Washington said in his Farewell Address about the growth of political parties.

Mr. HILL. Of course, at that time there were no political parties, as we know them today. George Washington did not favor political parties; the Senator from Arkansas is correct about that. But, after all, the question we are considering today has nothing whatever to do with political parties.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. George Washington spoke of the growth of political parties as being one of the great dangers to government, and I thought there possibly might be a little partisan politics involved in the joint resolution which is now before the Senate.

Mr. HILL. The Senator from Alabama is indeed correct about politics in the pending resolution, and I shall refer to it later in my remarks.

Mr. President, we know that none of the founding fathers was more strongly in favor of rotation in office than was Thomas Jefferson. No man feared autocratic power more, or was more conscious than he of the threat of autocratic power. Yet we find the following statement made by Mr. Jefferson in a letter written on January 6, 1805, to his friend, Colonel Taylor, of Virginia:

> There is, however, but one circumstance that could engage my acquiescence in another election; to wit, such a division about a successor as might bring in a monarchist. But this circumstance is impossible.

That statement by Thomas Jefferson shows that although he was the strongest advocate of rotation in office, nevertheless he recognized that there might arise a situation involving a danger and an emergency in which he himself would favor a continuation in office of the President.

Mr. President, I believe that Alexander Hamilton is generally credited as being, if not the founding father, certainly the spiritual father of the Republican Party. I wish to call the attention of the Senate, and particularly the attention of my Republican friends on the other side of the aisle, to what Alexander Hamilton had to say on the question of a limitation of the Presidential term. In the Federalist he wrote that the President—

> Is to be elected for 4 years, and is to be eligible as often as the people of the United States shall think him worthy of their confidence.

Then he added:

> There is no nation which has not, at one period or another, experienced an absolute necessity of the services of particular men, in particular situations, perhaps it would not be too strong to say to the preservation of its political existence. How unwise, therefore, must be every self-denying ordinance, as serves to prohibit a nation from making use of its own citizens, in the manner best suited to its exigencies and circumstances.

Mr. President, in connection with this statement by Alexander Hamilton, it is interesting to think of Winston Churchill and of the conditions which existed in Britain at the time when Mr. Churchill came into office during the past war. It is not necessary for me to attempt to depict those conditions to the Senate. I think most of us have wondered what might have been the fate of Britain but for the courage and leadership of Mr. Churchill in that dreadful hour.

John Quincy Adams spoke on this subject. He saw no reason for a limitation on the tenure of office or the number of terms which a President might serve. Other of the founding fathers—James Wilson, Gouverneur Morris, and Roger Sherman, who likewise were members of the constitutional convention—had strong convictions on the subject; they were opposed to any limitation on the people in their right of free election of their President.

Perhaps one of the best statements ever made on this subject was made by a former President of the United States when he was a Member of the House of Representatives. I refer to James Buchanan. In 1829, on the floor of the House of Representatives, he had the following to say:

> The day may come, when dangers shall lower over us, and when we may have a president at the helm of State who possesses the confidence of the country, and is better able to weather the storm than any other pilot; shall we, then, under such circumstances, deprive the people of the United States of the power of obtaining his services for a second term? Shall we pass a decree, as fixed as fate, to bind the American people and prevent them from ever reelecting such a man? I am not afraid to trust them with this power.

Mr. President, in those words Representative Buchanan, later President Buchanan, summed up eloquently and conclusively the case against the pending amendment.

To come to a more recent period, let me refer to a Republican who challenged my admiration more than any Republican of our time, Theodore Roosevelt. Let me read what he said:

> If, for instance, a tremendous crisis occurred at the end of the second term of a man like Lincoln, as such a crisis occurred at the end of his first term, it would be a veritable calamity if the American people were forbidden to continue to use the services of the one man who they knew, and did not merely guess, could carry them through the crisis. * * *
> While it is well to keep it as a custom, it would be a mark both of weakness and of unwisdom for the American people to embody it into a constitutional provision which could not do them good and on some given occasion might work real harm.

Mr. President, why put such an amendment as this in the Constitution? Of some 32 different Presidents only one has been elected for more than two terms. Can we not trust the wisdom, the judgment, of the people of the United States? Why put the iron hand of this rigid prohibition on the people of the United States?

The great protagonist and contemporary of Theodore Roosevelt, Woodrow Wilson, spoke on this subject, too. When he was asked about limiting a President to one 6-year term, with prohibition against reelection, he made the following statement——

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield before he leaves Theodore Roosevelt?

Mr. HILL. I yield.

Mr. LUCAS. The Senator was discussing what Theodore Roosevelt said. He will also remember that Theodore Roosevelt said at one time after finishing his second term, he would never be a candidate for President again. That was in 1908.

Mr. HILL. He did.

Mr. LUCAS. But we all recall that in 1912 he threw his hat in the ring. I think those were the very words he used, "My hat is in the ring." It will also be recalled that at that time, in 1912, Theodore Roosevelt, being a candidate for President for a third time, got more votes than did President Taft, who was then running for a second term.

Mr. HILL. The Senator is exactly correct, and I was coming to that later in my remarks.

Mr. LUCAS. My only reason for interrupting was that I thought the Senator was leaving the discussion of Theodore Roosevelt.

Mr. HILL. No; I expected to return to Theodore Roosevelt, who was such a dynamic man that it is difficult at times to refrain from discussing him. Roosevelt received 88 and Taft received only 8 electoral votes in the election of 1912. But I shall come to that in a moment, if the Senator will bear with me.

I was about to quote that Woodrow Wilson said on this question:

> Put the customary limitation of two terms into the Constitution, if you do not trust the people to take care of themselves.

That is the whole question here today: If we do not trust the people, if we do not have faith in the people to act with wisdom, to act with sound judgment, to act with intelligence, to do that which is wisest and best, then we are justified in limiting them in their actions by such a constitutional amendment as the one now proposed.

Woodrow Wilson also said:

> We singularly belie our own principles by seeking to determine by fixed constitutional provision what the people shall determine for themselves.

We say we believe in the people, that the people should be sovereign, that they should be the ruler, and, indeed, that they are the rulers. But as Woodrow Wilson well said, we singularly belie those expressions and principles of democracy—

> By seeking to determine by fixed constitutional provision what the people shall determine for themselves.

Mr. BALDWIN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. HILL. I yield.

Mr. BALDWIN. I have listened to much of the argument advanced by the learned Senator from Alabama, but on the particular point he is now raising, let me inquire would it not be the people who were deciding for themselves if this joint resolution were passed and the whole question were submitted to conventions in the several States? A great many people think this would be a good constitutional change. Why not let them decide that question for themselves?

Mr. HILL. In theory, it would be the people deciding, perhaps, but we know something about conventions; we know something about how delegates are elected; we know something about what happens in conventions. Why should we submit this question to conventions, when the people themselves, by direct vote, by going to the ballot boxes and themselves voting, could pass on the question? I shall come to that point later.

The Senator from Connecticut refers to constitutional conventions, and I notice that the joint resolution reported by the Committee on the Judiciary proposes to submit the question of ratification to constitutional conventions in the States. Having been a Member of Congress for a long time, and having observed conference committees over a series of years, I have serious doubt whether the pending measure, if it shall be passed by the Senate, will come out of the conference with a provision for ratification by constitutional conventions. When the resolution was before the House of Representatives the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. COLMER] offered an amendment to have the question submitted to constitutional conventions rather than the State legislatures, and the Colmer amendment was shouted down. Knowing conferences with the House as I do, I rather fear that when this provision goes to conference the House conferees will be found standing adamant in their insistence that the House provision be accepted and that the amendment be submitted to the State legislatures.

I shall discuss that question a little later in my remarks, but I may say to the Senator now that if this amendment is submitted that it will go to the people with a certain recommendation from the Congress; it carries a congressional imprint which gives it a certain urge, as it were, for approval by the people.

Mr. BALDWIN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. HILL. I yield.

Mr. BALDWIN. In the election of 1940, and again in 1944, did not upward of 20,000,000 people in the United States express the opinion that they thought the President ought not to serve more than two terms? Of course, that was intermingled with the other issues in the campaign, but it is well to use that as an argument against, as well as an argument for, the Senator's position.

Mr. HILL. The Senator from Connecticut indulges in a violent presumption when he says that all the 20,000,000 people voted on the third-term issue. For instance, I do not imagine my able and distinguished friend from Connecticut would have voted for the Democratic candidate, regardless of whether there had been any question of a third term. I am sure he would not have voted for the Democratic candidate.

Mr. BALDWIN. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. HILL. I yield.

Mr. BALDWIN. The Senator says I am indulging in a violent presumption by suggesting that upward of 20,000,000 people voted against a third or a fourth term. I might remind my good friend that he is also indulging in a more violent presumption in intimating that twenty-three-million-odd people voted for it. So it cuts both ways.

Mr. HILL. Twenty-three-million-odd people exercised their right to continue a man in office for a third term.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Alabama yield?

Mr. HILL. I yield.

Mr. LUCAS. I should like to know where all the excitement with respect to the proposed constitutional amendment arises. The Senator from Illinois has received exactly eight letters from his constituents on this question. That is a pretty fair indication that the people of Illinois and of the Nation are not very much excited about the constitutional limitation which it is now sought to write into the Constitution. They are more interested in the high cost of living; in the portal-to-portal pay bill; and in other labor measures than they are in this particular question. This is a political issue, and that is all there is to it. Consider the vote in the House of Representatives. The record in the House of Representatives—and the able Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. WILEY] used it as an argument on Wednesday last—shows that 44 Democrats voted favorably on this issue. The Senator from Wisconsin did not state the fact that in the House of Representatives not a single Republican voted against this issue; yet this is referred to in the discussion as being a nonpartisan approach to a great question of this kind.

Mr. HILL. Of course, as the Senator from Illinois suggests, if this were not a political matter it would not be rushed on to the floor of the Senate without hearings.

Mr. LUCAS. Of course not.

Mr. HILL. It would not be rushed in ahead of all the important legislation to which the Senator has referred.

Mr. BALDWIN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield, to permit me to answer the statement about this being a political matter?

Mr. HILL. I yield.

Mr. BALDWIN. I think that is rather a ridiculous assumption to make. Of course it is political. Ours is a political form of government, a party form of government, and we are only fooling ourselves when we say we are not indulging in politics. I hope we are indulging in politics of the highest order, politics in the sense of politics being the science of government. In this situation I should like to quote as authority the founder of the Democratic Party who, away back in 1805, said:

> The service for 8 years with a power to remove at the end of the first four, comes nearly to my principle as corrected by experience; and it is in adherence to that, that I determine to withdraw at the end of my second term. The danger is that the indulgence and attachments of the people will keep a man in the chair after he becomes a dotard, that reelection through life shall become habitual, and election for life follow that.

May I say further——

Mr. HILL. Mr. President, I do not wish to be discourteous to the Senator, but I should prefer that he make his speech in his own time, because I should really like to proceed.

Mr. BALDWIN. I beg the Senator's pardon.

Mr. HILL. I yield. I do not want to be discourteous.

Mr. BALDWIN. I close by saying that I understand the Senator does not subscribe to that pronouncement of doctrine by Thomas Jefferson.

Mr. HILL. I do not know whether the Senator was on the floor at the time, but I read to the Senate a little earlier in my remarks the doctrine of Thomas Jefferson to which I subscribe, a doctrine expressed by Thomas Jefferson in the year 1805, when, in a letter written to Colonel Taylor, of Virginia, on January 6, 1805, Mr. Jefferson said:

> There is, however, one circumstance that could engage my acquiescence in another election; to wit, such a division about a successor as might bring in a monarchist. But this circumstance is impossible.

In other words, Jefferson says that there might arise circumstances or conditions involving danger or an emergency, and in such event he would acquiesce in another election.

Mr. BALDWIN. In answer to my good friend, I am of the opinion from reading other statements made by Jefferson, that his final decision was that whatever the circumstance might be other considerations against a third term far outweighed the arguments for it. It seems to me that is the point.

Mr. HILL. I think not. I think Jefferson's language speaks for itself. I think it is very clear. Mr. Jefferson's language is clear that under certain circumstances he would acquiesce in another election.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HILL. I yield to the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. Possibly this is not the appropriate time to ask the question I am about to ask, and if it is not, the Senator, I hope, will tell me so; but he has quoted Washington, Hamilton, Buchanan, Wilson, and Theodore Roosevelt, all of whom were in positions of authority and responsibility many years ago. In the last 30 years many changes have taken place in forms of government throughout the world. We have seen greater concentrations of power, including a much greater concentration of power in the Government of the United States. Does not the honorable Senator think that that alters the situation, so that the opinions of many of those he has cited have become out of date, and does he not believe that the question before us today concerns much more the last 30 years than anything that had happened during the previous 200 years?

Mr. HILL. No; I think that the dictatorships of recent years are a reversion to early tyrannies in that power has been taken out of the hands of the people, as the Senator from Massachusetts suggests and put into the hands of the few. The Senator will recall that Woodrow Wilson spoke about fighting World War I to make the world safe for democracy. Unfortunately and tragically most of the democracies that came into being at the end of that war, and that were in existence at that time, have ceased to be.

The power has been taken out of the hands of the people and put into the hands of a few. That is the very reason that I am so strongly opposed to this proposed constitutional amendment. I want the power to remain in the hands of the people. I trust the people. I have faith in them. I do not want to deny them this power.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HILL. I yield.

Mr. LUCAS. As a thought-provoking answer to the question raised by the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts I should like to remind the Senator that when the founders of the Republic gave birth to the Constitution of the United States they had been living under a king for many long years. Much is said today about dictatorships. We know that kings of that day were just as ruthless, arbitrary, capricious, brutal, and vile as any dictators who have appeared on the scene in later years.

Mr. HILL. We know too that every nation in the world, except our own and tiny Switzerland, was under an absolute king or monarch.

Mr. LUCAS. That is correct and notwithstanding that experience of being governed by kings which the founders of the Republic had for many years they set forth, after long and bitter debate, what we find in the Constitution today.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HILL. Yes; I yield.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. May I say in reply to the distinguished Senator from Illinois, that the quotations from the early Presidents and others in authority in our history showed that they wanted no man to remain in office for too long a time.

Mr. HILL. The quotations show that those men wanted the people to retain the power, and the right to use their wisdom and their best judgment in continuing a man in office, in a great crisis or emergency. That is what they show.

Mr. President, it has not been very long since the leonine Senator Borah, of Idaho, sat on this floor. Many of us who are present today had the great privilege of serving with him. It is interesting to note what Senator Borah had to say. Speaking on this floor not many years ago, he stated:

> One of the fundamental reasons for opposing the joint resolution—

That was a resolution, of course, to limit the term, to limit the right of the people to elect their President—

> One of the fundamental reasons for opposing the joint resolution is that the people who could be trusted to determine whether or not they desire a President for a second term may also be trusted to determine whether or not they desire a President for a third term.

In other words, Senators in favor of this amendment are saying, "Well, we will let them elect the President the first time; we will let them elect him the second time; but we do not trust them so far as the third time is concerned. We who oppose the amendment have faith in their wisdom, in their judgment, in their patriotism, to let them determine whether they think it is to the best interests of our country, and whether they feel that the needs and the conditions of our country demand that a President be retained in office."

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HILL. I yield to the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. LUCAS. Does the Senator understand that an amendment will be proposed, limiting Senators to two terms?

Mr. HILL. If it is, I readily predict it will not receive a handfull of votes.

Mr. LUCAS. I was told that a Senator was thinking of introducing such a bill. It was one of the rumors that go around and which we hear.

Mr. OVERTON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. HILL. I yield to the Senator from Louisiana.

Mr. OVERTON. For many years in the State of Louisiana we have enjoyed—and I used the word "enjoyed" advisedly—a constitutional inhibition against the Governor of the State succeeding himself. He can have one term of 4 years. A similar provision is to be found in the constitutions of other States. Am I to be told that the people of such States which have adopted such a provision have no confidence in themselves? These State constitutions were for the most part adopted by the people.

The constitutional amendment under consideration would be submitted for ratification to the people assembled in conventions in the different States. Why cannot the people of the United States say, "We think it is unsafe for a President to have the power to succeed himself for a fourth term?" Why cannot the people say, "In our opinion the President, who may be popular and who may be persuasive, and who may have a greedy grasp for power will, the longer he remains in office, be more able to control the elections, and he will by virtue of his high office be in a position to exercise a potent political influence for his own benefit and his own aggrandizement"?

That, Mr. President, is the attitude of the people of my State. It is not that they do not have any confidence in themselves; but they do not have such a superlative degree of confidence in the elected Chief Executive as to say that he might not use the power of his office for political purposes.

Mr. LUCAS. I was wondering if the Senator from Louisiana thinks we made a mistake in 1940?

Mr. OVERTON. Indeed, I do. When Roosevelt announced for a third term, I came out openly in the newspapers and opposed his nomination. And when he announced for a fourth term, I opposed his nomination. But after he was nominated, being a Louisiana-born, dyed-in-the-wool Democrat who never scratched the Democratic ticket in his life on general election day, I went through and "stamped the rooster," which is the emblem of the Democratic Party in Louisiana, and thereby voted for all the Democratic electors and for every Democrat on the ticket from ward constable on up. But when it came to the nomination for a third and a fourth term, I recorded in the newspapers, not once but a number of times, my opposition to the renomination of Roosevelt to be President of the United States. I am sorry the Senator from Illinois does not keep up with current history.

Mr. LUCAS. Oh, I know the Senator was against the renomination of President Roosevelt in the convention, but I was wondering what he did in the general election. He now takes such an unqualified position and pleads so eloquently against the great danger that is involved that I do not see how he could have supported Roosevelt in 1940 under such conditions.

Mr. OVERTON. Oh, there are other reasons, and I think the Senator knows the other reasons. In Louisiana we have got to be Democrats. We have got to be Democrats because we want a Caucasian government in Louisiana, and that is the best way to have it.

Mr. HILL. Mr. President, my good friend the Senator from Louisiana was in effect propounding a question to me in what he said. Permit me to say that I can see no analogy whatever between the Governor's office and the office of the President of the United States. With all due respect to the Governor and to his office and to its powers and importance, that office, in respect to its importance to the people of the United States, in respect to the problems which may or will confront it, is not in any way whatever comparable to the office of President of the United States.

There has never been any office in all the world's history that has placed so much responsibility upon the shoulders of one man, that has brought so many problems for solution to any one man, that involves so much so far as the fate of his country and of other countries are concerned, as the office of the President of the United States does today.

Mr. OVERTON. Mr. President, will the Senator again yield to me?

Mr. HILL. I yield.

Mr. OVERTON. That is the very reason I favor this constitutional amendment. There is vested in the President of the United States not only a greater responsibility than that vested in any governor but there is vested in him an infinitely greater power. When he becomes President of the United States to serve for two terms there is an opportunity for him not only to be elected for a third term by reason of the exercise of the tremendous power which he has, but to make a life termer of himself. That is a danger which we confront. From that we might drift into a dynasty.

Mr. HILL. The Senator has branched off onto the subject of dynasties. I do not want to enter into a discussion of that subject. I want to talk about democracy.

Mr. OVERTON. I understand that. A governor has a great deal of power. The President has much greater power. At the time of the adoption of the Constitution the governors of the several States had greater powers than did the President. But gradually the central government has encroached upon the powers of the local governments. Greater and greater power has been concentrated in the hands of the President until, when elected, he stands like a great giant over the body politic of the United States, and he cannot only succeed himself for a second term but, if he desires, he has a very good opportunity to succeed himself for a third term, a fourth term, and a fifth term until he perishes in his office.

Mr. HILL. Of course, the President has no power whatever to continue himself in office for a second term, a third term, or for any other additional term or terms. The only way any man can be President of the United States is by the suffrage of the people of the United States.

Mr. BALDWIN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HILL. I yield.

Mr. BALDWIN. I take it the Senator believes there has been no man in the history of the United States who relied more firmly on the belief that the people knew what was best for them than did Thomas Jefferson. Is that not so?

Mr. HILL. Thomas Jefferson certainly had great faith in the people.

Mr. BALDWIN. Undoubtedly he had great faith in the people. My good friend from Alabama a little while ago read a letter which Thomas Jefferson wrote to Mr. Taylor in 1807, as I recall, in which there was an intimation to the effect that if the country were in difficulty at the time of the ending of his second term that might be occasion for his continuing in office. Is that correct?

Mr. HILL. That was not his language, but that was the gist of what he said.

Mr. BALDWIN. If I may I should like to read excerpts from a letter written by Thomas Jefferson to Henry Guest in January 1809, which, as I recall, was after Jefferson ceased to be President. He said:

> I am sensible of the kindness of your rebuke on my determination to retire from office at a time when our country is laboring under difficulties truly great. But if the principle of rotation be a sound one, as I conscientiously believe it to be with respect to this office, no pretext should ever be permitted to dispense with it, because there never will be a time when real difficulties will not exist, and furnish a plausible pretext for dispensation. You suppose I am "in the prime of life for rule." I am sensible I am not; and before I am so far declined as to become insensible of it, I think it right to put it out of my own power.

Apparently between the time Jefferson wrote the letter to Mr. Taylor and the time he wrote the letter to Mr. Guest he may have had a change of heart. Nevertheless, it seems to me, Mr. President, that the later statement of Thomas Jefferson is most conclusive on the subject of whether or not difficulties can be so great as to require that a man be continued in the Presidential office.

I thank the Senator from Alabama for yielding to me.

Mr. HILL. As I understood what the Senator from Connecticut read, Jefferson made some reference to his physical condition. The idea was that his physical condition, among other things, would not permit him to accept the place for a third term. But when he was physically sound and able to carry on the office he declared that there was a circumstance under which he would acquiesce in continuing in office.

Mr. BALDWIN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HILL. I yield.

Mr. BALDWIN. The language used by Thomas Jefferson was this:

> But if the principle of rotation be a sound one, as I conscientiously believe it to be with respect to this office, no pretext should ever be permitted to dispense with it.

Mr. HILL. The Senator from Connecticut simply took a sentence from the context. He must go further and read the statement of Mr. Jefferson which I read.

Mr. STEWART. I was not in the Chamber when the Senator from Alabama began his address. Reference was made by the Senator from Connecticut to the fact that we often refer to Thomas Jefferson as the founder of the Democratic Party, which is correct. I do not know whether the Senator from Alabama quoted from the founder of the Republican Party on this subject, but I have before me a quotation from Alexander Hamilton.

Mr. HILL. I will say to my friend that I quoted from Alexander Hamilton.

Mr. STEWART. He was the founder of the Republican Party. In a letter which appears in the Federalist, and in which he had written in March 1788, when the newly drafted Constitution was being circulated among the States for approval, Mr. Hamilton said, in supporting the framers of our Constitution in their position that no limitation should be placed upon the number of terms a man might serve as President of the United States:

A fourth ill effect of the exclusion (that is, limitation on number of terms) would be the banishing of men from stations in which, in certain emergencies of the state, their presence might be of the greatest moment to the public interest or safety. There is no nation which has not, at one period or another, experienced an absolute necessity of the services of particular men in particular situations; perhaps it would not be too strong to say to the preservation of its political existence. How unwise, therefore, must be every such self-denying ordinance as serves to prohibit a nation from making use of its own citizens in the manner best suited to its exigencies and circumstances. Without supposing the personal essentiality of the man, it is evident that a change of the Chief Magistrate at the breaking out of a war—or at any similar crisis, for another, even of equal merit, would at all times be detrimental to the community, inasmuch as it would substitute inexperience to experience, and would tend to unhinge and set afloat the already settled train of the administration.

How prophetic his words were—

If that is repetition—which it perhaps is to a certain extent—I apologize to the Senator. But I wished to make that observation at this particular time because it seems that the founders of the two parties are somewhat at variance in their opinions. Last night I thought I had my mind pretty well made up on this question; but after reading considerable from Jefferson and Hamilton I find myself more at sea than ever. As a matter of fact, both of them seem to have weighed this question and to have expressed their opinions on both sides, as is often done here in the Senate.

As I say, I find myself somewhat disturbed as to how to vote on the question; but the chief thing to be decided here today, as I see it, is whether or not this question shall be submitted to the people, as, indeed, all resolutions which have for their purpose the amendment of the Constitution must be. But this question would not have arisen, would it, if it had not been for the fact that President Roosevelt was elected for a third and a fourth term.

Mr. HILL. The Senator is exactly correct. In the history of our country there have been approximately 170 such resolutions, none of which was able to muster sufficient strength or support from the people to pass both Houses of Congress.

Mr. STEWART. I remember on one occasion reading a statement by Jefferson, when he was insisting that perhaps there should be a limitation on the number of terms, to the effect that if such a limitation were not adopted in the early history of the country, perhaps it would never be adopted, because he had the feeling that the Government would continue to grow stronger and continue to encroach upon the liberties of the people, and that the liberties of the people would continue to be surrendered to such encroachment.

Mr. HILL. Instead of encroaching on the liberties of the people, the history of our country shows that the people have obtained more and more rights and greater and greater power. A study of the amendments to the Constitution—and I expect to refer to them shortly in my address—discloses that we have protected the people in their rights, and augmented and extended them.

As I stated a little while ago, so far as the election of President is concerned, instead of carrying out the original intent of having the President elected by the electoral college, almost from the beginning, as a practical matter, the President has been elected by the direct vote of the people.

So far as the President being able to continue himself in office is concerned, he has no power to do so. He cannot do it unless the people, by their suffrage, vote, to continue him in office.

It is most interesting to note in this connection that of the 33 Presidents of the United States, only 8 have served two full consecutive terms. As we know, Grover Cleveland served two terms, but they were not consecutive. But of the 33 Presidents we have had in the United States, only 8 have been able to serve two full consecutive terms; and of the eight only three have served since the War Between the States. During that whole period of 85 years since the War Between the States, only three Presidents have been reelected and have served for two consecutive terms.

Mr. LUCAS rose.

Mr. OVERTON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield so that I may address a question to both the Senator from Alabama and the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. HILL. Mr. President, there are three Senators on their feet. Let the Senator from Tennessee conclude.

Mr. OVERTON. I should like to address one brief question to the Senator from Alabama and the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. HILL. I yield for that purpose.

Mr. OVERTON. Is it not a fact that at one time Hamilton advocated a monarchy for the United States?

Mr. HILL. He advocated life tenure. Every schoolboy knows that.

Mr. STEWART. Mr. President, will the Senator further yield?

Mr. HILL. I yield.

Mr. STEWART. One interesting observation concerning Mr. Jefferson's insistence from time to time in his letters that there should be a limitation on the number of terms is that on one occasion, in one of his letters, written during the administration of George Washington, he stated, in effect, that the President then serving should not be subject to the two-term limitation because of the fact that he had merits and was an able man. I think that very observation weakens many of the statements Mr. Jefferson might have made in opposition to perpetuation in office, as he calls it.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HILL. I yield.

Mr. LUCAS. I should like to make a further observation with respect to Jefferson. Jefferson took the position, long before he was President of the United States, that the President should serve only one term.

Mr. HILL. That is correct.

Mr. LUCAS. He argued that question back and forth and broadcast his views to all parts of the country through letters; but he had no qualms about seeking reelection for a second term. He told the country that the people and the party were demanding that he accept a second term. That is history. That is exactly what Thomas Jefferson did. He went on to say, in his letter to Taylor, which the Senator has already read, that in a great emergency he would even take a third term.

Mr. HILL. The Senator is exactly correct.

Mr. President, I wonder if I might call the attention of the Senate at this time to a statement of the distinguished grandfather of the distinguished junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], the late Senator Henry Cabot Lodge, Sr., in which he said:

I have no fear that they [the American people] can be fully trusted with the power to say whether or not a man shall serve a second term or a third term.

The pending joint resolution, which seems to be so strongly supported by Senators on the other side of the aisle, Members of the Republican Party, found no such support by Republicans in past days. In 1880, 306 delegates to the Chicago Republican Convention held out for 36 ballots for the nomination of Gen. Ulysses S. Grant, who was running for a third term. The roll was called 36 times, and on each and every one of those 36 roll calls the faithful Old Guard of Republicans held out for a third-term nomination for General Grant. As we know, of course, it was only when General Garfield was brought forward as a compromise candidate that the convention was able to make a nomination, and it nominated General Garfield.

In 1912, 4,206,020 Republicans voted for Theodore Roosevelt for a third term. Theodore Roosevelt received 88 electoral votes. Only 3,483,922 Republicans voted for President Taft, and President Taft received only 8 electoral votes. So the majority of Republicans voting in the election in 1912 felt that the situation was such that a former President should be put back in office for a third term. They felt, in spite of what their feelings might be about two terms or any other limitation on the Presidency, that the situation at that time warranted them in voting to put Theodore Roosevelt back into the Presidency for a third term.

The Senator from Illinois has referred to the politics of this situation. We might as well be frank. We know that there are some who still hate and fear Franklin D. Roosevelt. There are some who would like to slap at the ghost of Franklin D. Roosevelt.

There are legitimate reasons why one might support this resolution; but surely there are some who would support it in an effort to repudiate the memory, the work, and the immortal services of Franklin D. Roosevelt.

History shows that in the 85 years since the War Between the States, only one Republican President has been elected for two full terms. That President, of course, was Gen. Ulysses S. Grant. No other Republican President has ever been able to serve two full terms in all that 85 years of time. Perhaps it is feared that the Democratic Party, the party of Jefferson, of Jackson, of Wilson, of Roosevelt, may suddenly bring forth another great giant among men, and that the American people, if they have the right to do so, may wish to continue him in office for more than the customary two terms. The people may feel that it is to the best interests of the country, and that it is the better part of wisdom, to keep so great a President in the Presidential office.

As I said a few minutes ago, the whole tenor of our Government has been toward a greater degree of democracy and placing more power in the hands of the people. There is not an action which we have taken in the amendment of our fundamental law, the Constitution, which was in any way a negation of representative democracy.

Mr. BALDWIN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HILL. I yield to the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. BALDWIN. I take it that there have been few men in the history of the United States who have believed more strongly in the rule of the people than did Andrew Jackson. Is that correct?

Mr. HILL. Yes; and I know what the Senator is about to say. He is about to say that Andrew Jackson, in his first and second messages to Congress, recommended that the Presidency be limited to one term, and then took a second term himself, and that he proceeded to name his successor. No man in the history of our country ever named his successor as completely as did Andrew Jackson in naming Martin Van Buren.

Mr. BALDWIN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to permit me to read from those two messages?

Mr. HILL. If the Senator wishes to read them into the RECORD I am glad to have him do so. I hope the Senator will put some "punch" into it.

Mr. BALDWIN. Mr. President, this quotation comes from President Jackson's message in which he was discussing the change in the Constitution with reference to the electoral college, which he recommended. He then went on to say—and I shall try to imitate the vehemence of that great citizen:

> In connection with such an amendment it would seem advisable to limit the service of the Chief Magistrate to a single term of either 4 to 6 years.

In his second annual message to Congress, in December, 1830, he said this:

> I cannot too earnestly invite your attention to the propriety of promoting such an amendment of the Constitution as will render him ineligible after one term of service.

That is what he believed.

Mr. HILL. No one admires Andrew Jackson more than I do. He has been one of my great heroes, one of the great figures not only of our country but of all the world. But Andrew Jackson did what we sometimes see even in this body; he talked one way and later acted another way, because he declared himself to be in favor of one term and then accepted a second term.

Mr. BALDWIN. I did not suppose a Democrat ever did that.

Mr. HILL. Oh, yes. I will say to the Senator that I realize I am divulging a great secret, but once in a while a Democrat might do that for the reason that men change their minds. I have found that the greater a man is the more likely he is to change his mind; certainly the more ready he is to change his mind. I recall that on one occasion a friend of Abraham Lincoln rather chided him for changing his mind, but Mr. Lincoln's horse-sense reply was, "It is an exceedingly dumb man who doesn't have more sense today than he had yesterday."

After Andrew Jackson had been in office as President of the United States, he had the experience and the knowledge which came from serving in that office. He was a wiser man when he accepted a second term than he was when he declared against a second term.

Mr. BALDWIN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further to me?

Mr. HILL. I yield to my friend, the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. BALDWIN. Does it not seem, then, that a man who makes a statement that he will serve only one term or only two terms, and then changes his mind, brings about a situation which ought not to be permitted to exist? It is along that route, it seems to me, that dictatorships move. That is why, Mr. President, I believe that now is the time, in the calmness of this hour, that we should submit this question to the people, to let them decide it, as the joint resolution proposes to let them do, in the conventions which would be set up under its provisions.

Mr. HILL. Mr. President, what is it that the Poet said about consistency and little minds going together? Perhaps my distinguished friend, the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. FULBRIGHT], who is a graduate of Oxford, could give us the exact words. There is no question that the smaller the man, the smaller the mind, the more routine and consistent and rigid he is in his conduct and his views. It is the man of great mind and intellect, of great comprehension, and a genius for large affairs, a man such as Abraham Lincoln, who realizes that he has more sense today than he had yesterday, and who makes today's decision on the basis of his knowledge, experience, and intelligence of today, not on the basis of a decision which he made at some prior time.

Mr. President, as I was saying, a majority of the Republicans of 1912 voted for Theodore Roosevelt for a third term. In that connection it is interesting to note the votes cast for Franklin D. Roosevelt. In 1940, 27,243,466 Americans voted for Franklin D. Roosevelt to continue in office for a third term. Twenty-two million three hundred and four thousand seven hundred and fifty-five Americans voted for Wendell Willkie. So a majority of approximately 5,000,000 votes were cast for Franklin D. Roosevelt for a third term. Mr. Roosevelt received 449 electoral votes, while Mr. Willkie received only 82 electoral votes. Mr. Roosevelt carried 38 of the 48 States.

In 1944 the question was not a third term, but a fourth term for Mr. Roosevelt. He received 25,603,152 votes, and Mr. Dewey received 22,006,616 votes. In other words, Mr. Roosevelt received approximately 3,600,000 more votes than Mr. Dewey did, when the question was whether Mr. Roosevelt should be elected for a fourth term. Mr. Roosevelt then received 432 electoral votes; Mr. Dewey received only 99 electoral votes. Mr. Roosevelt carried 36 States, or three-fourths of all the States of the United States, when he was running for election for a fourth term.

In view of the votes for Theodore Roosevelt in 1912 and in view of the votes for Franklin D. Roosevelt in 1940 and 1944, Mr. President, is it surprising that today there is no demand from the people for the adoption of the constitutional amendment proposed by the joint resolution? The Senator from Illinois said he had received only eight letters about such a constitutional amendment. I can say that I have received no letter, no telegram, no telephone call, not one word from anyone, about such a constitutional amendment. If there be any real support among the people for such a constitutional amendment, it is so small that not even one person has been able to get himself a job as a lobbyist to come before the Congress and try to have it pass the joint resolution proposing such a constitutional amendment. So far as I know, there is no call, no demand, no request on the part of anyone for the passage of the joint resolution and the adoption of such an amendment to the Constitution.

The people realize that they are sovereign in this country. The first words in the Constitution of the United States are:

> We the people of the United States • • • do hereby ordain and establish this Constitution for the United States of America.

The people are the residuaries of all power.

They are not here today asking us to take away from them some of their power. The limitations provided by the Constitution are not limitations on the people, but they are limitations which the people placed on the Congress, on the Chief Executive, and on the judiciary. The Constitution provides that the Congress shall not pass an ex post facto law or a law prohibiting freedom of religion, freedom of speech, or freedom of the press. The inhibitions provided by the Constitution, Mr. President, are upon the Congress and the Chief Executive and the judiciary, but not upon the people.

As I said earlier in my remarks, all the steps that have been taken in the development of our Government have been in the direction of more democracy, more power in the hands of the people, and a greater exercise of such power. In fact, we know that the Constitution could not be ratified by the people until the first 10 amendments were agreed upon, and those 10 amendments were written into the Constitution in order to absolutely protect and safeguard the people in their great fundamental, individual rights.

Other amendments subsequently were made a part of the Constitution. One is the amendment providing for the direct election of Senators, so that those who sit in this body must hold their commissions directly from the people themselves, and the qualifications and fitness of those who hold seats in this body must be passed upon by the people when they go to the ballot boxes in their respective States.

Another amendment to the Constitution is the one providing for woman's suffrage. That amendment gives to a great body of our people, the women, the right to vote, the right to take part in elections, the right to have their say as to who shall be President of the United States, who shall sit in the Senate, who shall sit in the House of Representatives, who shall represent them, who shall pass their laws for them.

Mr. BALDWIN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. HILL. I yield to my friend, the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. BALDWIN. I should like to make this inquiry: Does not the Constitution of the State of Alabama provide that the Governor of that State can serve for only one term, and cannot succeed himself?

Mr. HILL. The Constitution of Alabama provides that the Governor of Alabama may serve as many terms as he can be elected to but that he may not be his own immediate successor. But let me say to the Senator from Connecticut, as I said a short time ago to the Senator from Louisiana, that I can see no analogy whatever, today, between the office of governor of a State and the office of President of the United States. I elucidated a little earlier what I thought about that. I suppose the Senator was called off the floor on some important matter. The duties, responsibilities, and problems and burdens of the President of the United States, his importance to the people of the United States, his importance to the people of all the world, cannot be compared with those of the governor of a State.

Mr. BALDWIN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. YOUNG in the chair). Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. HILL. I yield.

Mr. BALDWIN. I am under the impression that a good many of the States in recent years have adopted that sort of an amendment to their constitutions. It did not used to be so. I am sorry I did not hear what the learned Senator said as to the reason why the people of Alabama adopted that kind of an amendment.

Mr. HILL. I have no objection to the State provision, just as I said to the Senator I have no objection to the custom, ordinarily of a man not holding the office of President for more than two terms. The fact is that as to a number of Presidents I am very glad indeed they served but one term.

Mr. BALDWIN. I share the Senator's view in that regard.

Mr. HILL. I do not care to make a political speech about this matter at this time, but, oh, I have lived through days under some Presidents when I was most thankful that the American people, exercising their sovereign rights, sent them back home, away from the White House.

Mr. BALDWIN. Will the Senator yield to one more question?

Mr. HILL. Certainly I yield to the Senator.

Mr. BALDWIN. It seems strange to me that my friend on the other side of the aisle should be quoting as his authority prominent Republicans, and I should be quoting as authority for my side the arguments of prominent Democrats. But there is one more Democrat whose views I should like to get into the record. He, too, I believe, was a man in whom the people had great confidence, and who in turn looked to the people for his guidance and had great faith in their wisdom and judgment. I refer to Grover Cleveland. In a letter accepting the nomination for the Presidency in 1884, he said:

> And of the means to this end not one would, in my judgment, be more effective than an amendment of the Constitution disqualifying the President from reelection.

Of course, Mr. Cleveland served two terms, but they were not consecutive. So he was very consistent in what he himself said and did.

Mr. HILL. Some historians tell us that Mr. Cleveland was not altogether, shall I say, unhappy over the thought that he might be called, or drafted, for a third term. Certainly he lost no sleep over that report, I will say to the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. BALDWIN. I think that is the point that should be made, that these men, even though they put themselves on record as in favor of only one term, or two terms, yet when the time comes and the opportunity to continue themselves in office and in power is presented, they always yield. That is what this amendment to the Constitution would prevent.

Mr. HILL. The record shows that the people, in their wisdom and in the soundness of their judgment, did not under ordinary circumstances give a man a third term. Only one man in the whole history of the United States had a third term. I am not sure whether the Senator was on the floor or not, but I stated that of all the 33 Presidents, only 8 had had 2 full consecutive terms. As I said, only one Republican President has had two full terms in all the 85 years since the War Between the States.

Mr. BALDWIN. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. HILL. I yield.

Mr. BALDWIN. Of course, on the basis of that argument, I should be against the amendment, with the hope that a Republican might some time have the opportunity. I am willing to prevent it.

Mr. HILL. The Senator has many charming characteristics, and certainly one of them is his boundless optimism. [Laughter.] If the Senator is about to leave the floor I hope he will not do so at this time. The Senator knows, as well as I know, that if in 1912 and 1916 and 1932, whenever we had a Presidential election, the Republican Party had nominated a man for a third term, as a good Republican the Senator would have been campaigning to the limit of his ability to elect that Republican for a third term.

Mr. BALDWIN. Again I say, that is the very vice of the whole system. That should not be possible.

I am sorry the Senator has asked me not to leave the floor, because I have a meeting with a delegation I must attend. I should like nothing better than to remain and listen to the Senator.

Mr. HILL. My distinguished friend sheds such an aura of optimism around this Chamber that I really like to have him here, but I well understand the situation which compels him to leave, and I want him to know it has been a pleasure to yield to him.

Mr. BALDWIN. I thank the Senator.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Alabama yield?

Mr. HILL. I yield to the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. LUCAS. What is difficult for me to understand, in weighing the arguments of the proponents of the amendment, is this: Everyone knows that if the amendment is ratified it will be an absolute limitation upon the sovereign rights of the people. In my early days in grade school and in high school I studied civics and history. I have always understood that ours is a government of the people, and that the people have the right to make a choice of a man for President of the United States, and that it is the only government in the world where the people have such a right. Now a proposal is made to amend the Constitution by inserting a limitation of the kind proposed, taking away that right from the people of the United States. It is in violation of a fundamental principle of human rights. I consider the proposal dangerous to our liberties.

Mr. HILL. The Senator is exactly correct. I think he had to leave the floor for a few moments, but I called attention to the fact that the very first words in the Constitution are "We the people." All the rights, all the powers, belong to us, the people, except and save as we may delegate them to government, either to the Federal Government, to the States, or to some local government.

As I said also, all the limitations in the Constitution are on the Congress to protect the people, they are on the Chief Executive to protect the people, they are on the judiciary to protect the people. There are no limitations in the Constitution on the people. Now it is proposed that a limitation be put on the people, an iron prohibition to strike at the very cornerstone of democracy, the cornerstone of the rule of the people, which is the ballot box.

Mr. LUCAS. The Senator is absolutely correct, if he will pardon a further interruption—and I shall not concern myself much longer with the question in the Senator's time. It has seemed to me very strange when in the last few years I have heard, times without number, the argument made by those on the other side of the aisle that this administration was continuously whittling away the rights of the people, that we were constantly encroaching upon State governments, and upon the individual rights of the citizens of this country, to such a point that unless they removed the Democratic administration from office in Washington there would be a dictatorship. They charged over and over that the administration was gradually taking away the sovereign rights of the people.

Mr. President, the proposal before us is the real beginning of the taking away of the basic, sovereign rights of the American people, because the right of franchise is the most sacred right existing in this country today. This is one of the few places left in the world, as I said a moment ago, where people can exercise their free choice. Ours is still the people's government, and under no circumstances should they be deprived of their right to pass, by a straight-out vote at a national election, on who shall be President, just as was done in 1940 and 1944.

The Senator remembers that in 1940 billboards all over the United States carried a picture of Uncle Sam with his thumbs down on the third term. It was a big issue in that election, and the people made a choice, and I think they should have a right to do it again in the event circumstances like those in previous elections arise again.

Mr. HILL. The Senator is exactly correct in everything he has said, and I want him to take note of the fact that the first piece of legislation the Republican House of Representatives passes is the joint resolution proposing this constitutional amendment.

The first piece of legislation of any consequence that the Republican majority brings before the Senate—I am not ready to concede it will be passed, but the first piece of legislation of any consequence that the Republicans bring in when they obtain control of the Senate is a proposal by way of a constitutional amendment to try to take fundamental rights away from the people.

Mr. President, I was saying that the whole trend of Government in the United States was for more democracy, more power in the people, and I had referred to the woman's suffrage amendment and the direct election of Senators. Then, of course, there was the so-called lame duck amendment to bring the Congress closer to the people, to make the Congress more responsive to the will of the people, to make the Congress more directly representative of the wishes of the people. The whole course of our Government from the very beginning down to date has been toward more democracy, the enjoyment and exercise of greater rights by the people, the enjoyment and exercise of more power by the people. While we have advanced toward more democracy, while we have advanced for a greater rule by the people, we have found other nations throughout the world turning toward totalitarianism, toward autocratic rule. Today democracy in many countries is only a memory, and in its stead stands the denial of the rights of the people, the concentration of power in the hands of autocratic and ruthless leaders.

The pending proposed constitutional amendment would be a backward step; it would be retrogression; it would be traveling down the road of reaction; it would be a denial of democracy itself. It has been our proud boast for 170 years that the people of the United States are sovereign. Let us reject this proposed amendment and make sure that the people shall continue to be sovereign, that our Government shall continue to be in truth a Government of the people, by the people, and for the people.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD at this point some remarks which I prepared the day after the death of the late Franklin D. Roosevelt.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT

We gather today in the shadow of a great sorrow. Not since Abraham Lincoln fell has this Nation suffered such a tragedy. Franklin Roosevelt was the foremost man of America. He was the foremost man of all this world. His death is a loss to the Nation and to the world so great that no one today can know just how irreparable it is. He, more than any other man, held the hopes of the world.

Who can forget those dark days of the depression when men with questioning eyes, deep in distress, walked the streets or tramped the highways, searching for the jobs that were not to be found—when those who had held the political and economic power of the land and who had directed its business and shaped and controlled its Government knew not what to do and literally gave up the ghost. Banks had gone down, hundreds of them, like autumn leaves before winter's wind, and the Nation hung on the brink of economic chaos and financial ruin.

Who can forget that gallant, brave spirit, with his smile of courage and his words of hope, as he took over the Presidency of our country and declared that we had nothing to fear but fear itself. He promised action, and he gave us action. He did the needful and the daring. He met the great crisis. He restored the confidence of the people.

Under his inspiring leadership America again knew her greatness and felt her power. Because of the fundamental justice of his program business and industry and labor and agriculture began the long climb back to strength and stability, and the Nation was saved.

His program gave us the strength and the power with which we wage victorious warfare today. As our Armies race to Berlin, as our Navy and Air Force sweep the Pacific, we know the contribution that Franklin Roosevelt made to the victory that he did not live to see but that awaits us. For he was a leader possessed with genius for large affairs and the imagination and capacity for great and world-encompassing decisions.

Under his leadership the Nation's resources, human and material, have been mobilized and its strength and productive capacity have been marshaled in a way that has astounded not only the world but ourselves as well. We have done the things that men counted impossible. We have brought the full power of the Nation's might against our enemies while giving untold aid and strength to the British, the Russians, and the Chinese. We have crossed the seven seas, saved the freedom of our people, beaten Hitler's master race, and made impossible the dreams of the Japanese war lords.

When Franklin Roosevelt gathered at the table of giants, with Churchill, Stalin, and Chiang Kai-shek, he stood forth as a leader of the giants, who knew them and understood them and commanded their confidence and their admiration.

With Churchill, he gave us the Atlantic Charter, and it was he who proclaimed the "four freedoms." He gave to us and our western world the good-neighbor policy which has grown surer and stronger through the years, brought 21 nations of this Western World, with one exception only, to stand side by side in the present war, and found its splendid fruition in the Mexico City Conference.

At Moscow, Teheran, Cairo, Dumbarton Oaks, and Yalta, Franklin Roosevelt gave leadership and direction to the course that led the United States, Great Britain, Russia, and China to lay the foundation stones for an international organization for the peace of the world. As we look to the final erection at San Francisco of the edifice of such an organization for peace into which must go so much of his handiwork, we know that, like Moses of old, he was permitted to look down upon the promised land but not to enter into it.

Today he was to join with his fellow countrymen in paying tribute to Thomas Jefferson. He fought the battle that Jefferson fought; he fought for the fundamentals that Jefferson gave us. He fought for human rights, human progress, and human welfare. He fought that the people might enter into their inheritance and that every man and woman in the Republic might have a stake in government. He fought that democracy might be real in this land and that those who inhabit it might enjoy its fruits. He fought for a better and fairer opportunity for all the people and that a new light might shine in their faces—the light of hope, of peace, and of security.

And now he stands with Washington, with Jefferson, with Lincoln, with Wilson. He has joined the choice and master spirits of all the ages.

Mr. President, I loved Franklin Roosevelt living and I love him now. He is not dead. Is Washington dead? Is Jefferson dead? Is Lincoln dead? Franklin Roosevelt will never die. The influence of his life and work, of all that he did and of all that he stood for, will grow with the progressing years. His spirit will lift the hearts and purposes of men, move and inspire them to noble endeavor and great works, and light the pathway for humanity down the centuries.

Mr. O'CONOR. Mr. President, I have listened with the greatest interest to the discussion by the able senior Senator from Alabama, and while I cannot agree with his conclusions, I must compliment him highly upon the earnestness of his presentation, and particularly upon the depth of his research.

In approaching the consideration of provisions of the pending joint resolution one is given pause by the realization that never before in the history of the Union has any constitutional limitation been imposed upon Presidential tenure.

Yet it cannot be stated that a proposal of this general nature is something novel. As an indication of the fact that it has been a recurring question, it might be noted that there have been 140 proposals in the Congress regarding the imposition of a limitation on Presidential tenure. While the Senate should not be diverted from a reasoned and sound course of action, merely because the Constitution has endured without such an amendment, this very fact should suggest the advisability of considering the proposal entirely as an abstract one, upon its merits. It would seem preferable to avoid unnecessary references to a single case in which the two-term custom was not followed lest the fundamental question might be lost sight of in the collateral, even perhaps personal, references to the particular case. In this connection I wish to say that I recall that the able Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. WILEY] expressed such a sentiment a few days ago, a sentiment in which I heartily concur.

Limiting the consideration to what is best for the Nation, I favor passage of the joint resolution.

The primary purpose of this proposal is to allow the people of the Nation to decide for themselves whether they desire to have such a constitutional limitation. It would seem reasonable and proper that a proposal which has been recurring through the decades and has aroused such extended discussion and debate should be presented for decision by the people, who are entitled to have the Constitution conform to their wishes.

Nor should the Congress be deterred from taking such action by the contention that the Constitution is sacrosanct. The Constitution has been amended before, and doubtless will be amended again. As is, of course, known to everyone, the Constitution provides, by its terms, how it should be amended, thus indicating that even its framers recognized that developments in regard to the Nation's progress and economy might well warrant some modification.

In seeking now to provide a formal procedure for establishment of constitutional safeguards against long continuance in the Presidency, we are acting in accord with the thinking of the authors of the Constitution; otherwise, why the many safeguards which these men insisted upon? Why the early adoption of checks and balances to offset the accumulation of power in any branch of Government? Why the power of impeachment, of veto, of overriding a veto, of referendum, and repeal? Why the passage by the First Congress of the Bill of Rights? Why the insistence upon State rights?

And to whom was it given to maintain these defenses against unintended powers? It was given to Congress because this body had an ever-changing personnel and was beholden most intimately to the people. The authors of the Constitution, many of whom were members of the early branches of Government, were not so presumptuous as to suppose they had acted infallibly. As early as 1800—the fourth Presidential election—they discovered that they had made a serious mistake—one for which Alexander Hamilton paid with his life.

I refer to the original method of electing the President and the Vice President on the same ballot. It will be recalled that, either by coincidence or connivance, Aaron Burr—a Vice Presidential candidate—turned up in a tie vote for the Presidency with Thomas Jefferson. What did the Congress do about this error? It rectified it with just the sort of legislation we are considering today. The twelfth amendment shut the door forever on the possibility that a schemer could enter the Presidency by the back door.

Particularly as a representative of the people of Maryland do I believe it is consistent for me to support the pending proposal. At this very time in our State a similar proposed constitutional amendment is being readied for submission to the voters to limit the tenure of the governor of the State to two terms.

It may not be amiss to observe that this amendment to the State constitution was originated at the Democratic State convention held last July in Baltimore and also was included in the State platform to which we subscribed in our candidacies in the November elections. The people elected the State-wide Democratic ticket upon such a platform, and within the past month the proposed constitutional amendment has been passed by both houses of the General Assembly of Maryland and will be submitted at the next general election. I might say parenthetically that it has not been a party matter in Maryland, because the members of both parties have supported it, as is indicated by the fact that in the Maryland House of Delegates, composed of 123 members, representatives, of course, of both parties, there was a unanimous vote in favor of submitting the question to the people.

Not only does this occur to me as justification for the position I am taking but, referring to the situation in the State of Maryland, it will be most interesting to have the people take definite action and, after considering all phases of the questions, express their decision regarding the tenure of the Chief Executives both of the State and of the Nation.

Apropos of some references made during the very splendid address of the able Senator from Alabama, it came to my mind that today 18 States of the Union have in their constitutions limitations upon the terms of their chief executives.

Reverting to the question of the abstract principle involved, many considerations suggest themselves as supporting some restriction upon the occupancy of the office of Chief Executive of the Nation, as has been indicated here both by the questions and by the answers. No one was more definite, or more insistent, as to the danger of too long a service in the Presidency than was Thomas Jefferson.

Time and again did Andrew Jackson declare himself for a limitation of the service of the Chief Magistrate. Of the same mind was President Polk. James Buchanan proclaimed his belief that the example of Washington and his successors had determined that no President should be more than once reelected. And likewise as has been indicated here today, President Cleveland and other Chief Executives.

Mr. President, in my humble opinion, another consideration—and an important one—suggests itself. By that I refer to the need for keeping our governmental processes as close as possible to the people and to guard against any step which might tend to establish autocratic rule in our land. The example of the totalitarian countries is fresh in our minds.

With much force it can be argued, as was indicated by one of the questions of the able Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. SALTONSTALL] that the world of today is a different world than that in which the framers of our Constitution lived. There are ideologies of government rampant in the world today which are actively and unceasingly opposed to democracy as we know it. They would deny all those rights of the individual which we consider our priceless heritage. They would vest, and actually do vest in a great part of the world today, supreme power in a detached government—an autocratic power over every phase of the daily life of its citizens. So thoroughly have these alien doctrines of government been established in a vast portion of the world, and so widely have their proponents been able to spread their poisonous ideas, that today America almost alone of all the world powers stands as the true exemplar and exponent of democratic ideals as written into our Constitution by the founding fathers.

With such doctrines of government abroad, and with the minds of many, even in this country, saturated with ideas incompatible with democracy, there is danger, real danger, that in the days ahead some self-seeking leader may gain the Presidency and make use of the powers and privileges of that office to entrench himself therein.

We are living in a world of suddenness, and we have recognized this. We have delegated more and more authority into the hands of the President. This is well and good, but it calls for precautionary measures. Since there is less and less limit upon the powers of a Chief Magistrate, it is proper—it is wise—that there be more limits upon his tenure.

It would appear, therefore, that the resolution now before us, and likewise the amendment offered in the committee, providing that the voice of the States be expressed through conventions called for the purpose, are worthy of support. I believe that a convention specially called to consider this matter, with all the attendant publicity and special interest focused thereby upon the matter, will serve to bring forth an expression of public opinion that will represent to the fullest the wishes of all the people of all the States.

The point has been raised that in the event of a great national emergency, perhaps another war, it might be vital to America's security to retain a Chief Executive in office for a third term or longer.

When the time comes that there is no other man available among our 140,000,000 Americans who can adequately provide the required national leadership, no matter what the emergency, then America indeed will be in danger of destruction or dictatorship. Never, since the first volley on Bunker Hill, has America been without the leadership necessary to bring it through any crisis.

The only way to encourage and to guarantee continuance of such leadership is to take action to eliminate influences that would stifle the development of leaders in our political life.

Certainly nothing could act more definitely to halt or impede development of potential leadership in city, State, or Nation than to permit any one man or any one party to persuade the people that he or they alone are competent and therefore must be perpetuated in office.

To conclude, let it be said that, in accordance with American tradition and

American doctrine, the citizenry ought to be afforded the opportunity of deciding for themselves whether this limitation is to be imposed and respectfully I urge that they be given such an opportunity through the adoption of this resolution.

We have an opportunity on this measure to set up a safeguard that will certainly help to prolong the life of democracy in America.

REPUBLICAN PROMISE AND PERFORMANCE

Mr. BUSHFIELD obtained the floor.

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President——

Mr. BUSHFIELD. I yield to the Senator from Nevada.

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, I was recognized by the Chair. I should like to know why it is necessary for the Senator from South Dakota to yield to me.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. THYE in the chair). The Senator from South Dakota had the floor assured to him at the conclusion of the speech of the Senator from Maryland [Mr. O'CONOR].

Mr. McCARRAN. If that policy is to be pursued, it is a question which certainly should be discussed as it has been discussed in years past. No Senator has a right to the assurance of the floor. That question arose in the Seventy-ninth Congress, and in the Seventy-eighth Congress. It seems to me that the practice must stop, because if we are to have our names on a list to be recognized, the rules of the Senate will have to be changed very materially. The Presiding Officer recognized the Senator from Nevada, as he had a right to do, because he was first on his feet. I bring this question to the attention of the Senate now because if this custom is to prevail, some of us will have to protest.

Mr. BUSHFIELD. Mr. President, I think I was recognized first.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair recognized the Senator from South Dakota.

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, will the Senator from South Dakota yield?

Mr. BUSHFIELD. I yield.

Mr. McCARRAN. I will not stand idly by and permit this practice to continue. Senators should not be recognized because their names are on a list before the Presiding Officer. If such a practice is to be followed, favored Senators will be recognized right along, and some of us probably never will be recognized. If the Senator will now yield in order that I may place some material in the RECORD, I will submit this time.

Mr. BUSHFIELD. I stated that I would yield to the Senator.

Mr. McCARRAN. Very well. I want it known that I do not recognize that the Senator has the floor.

I ask the indulgence of the Senate for 10 minutes with respect to a matter which I consider to be of substantial importance.

Mr. BUSHFIELD. Just a moment, Mr. President. I decline to yield for 10 minutes. I understood that the Senator wished me to yield in order that he might place something in the RECORD. I have the floor, and expect to retain it.

Mr. McCARRAN. The Senator has yielded to me. Does he take back his permission? Is that the attitude of the Senator from South Dakota?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Nevada asked that he might have a moment. Does the Senator wish a moment, or does he wish to make a speech?

Mr. McCARRAN. What is a moment?

Mr. BUSHFIELD. The Senator asked permission to insert something in the RECORD.

Mr. McCARRAN. That is exactly what I wish to do.

Mr. BUSHFIELD. I decline to yield for 10 minutes at this time.

Mr. McCARRAN. Very well.

Mr. BUSHFIELD. Mr. President, Republicans were startled yesterday by the publication of the Gallup poll, which stated that 51 percent of the voters would vote Democratic if an election were held today. I am not particularly startled at the publication of this statement. Republicans in Congress have only themselves to blame for that situation.

Every Member of the Senate promised his constituents at the election on November 5 that if elected he would do certain things. Among the things that were promised was a reduction in taxes, a reduction in the amount of Government expenditures. We Republicans promised our constituents that if elected, some sensible labor legislation would be enacted. When the President's budget came along, we endeavored to make a substantial reduction in the budget as proposed. The joint committee of the Congress recommended a reduction in the budget by $6,000,000,000. The chairman of the Appropriations Committee of the Senate stated on the floor that a reduction of $6,000,000,000 could be obtained. The Senator from Virginia [Mr. BYRD], a Democrat, stated on the floor that such a reduction could be obtained.

Two months after election the Republicans took over complete control of the Congress, selecting all the chairmanships and organizing the Congress. More than 2 months have passed since Congress was thus organized, and what has been accomplished? Practically nothing. No labor legislation has been enacted, the budget has not been balanced, and we failed to cut the President's budget by $6,000,000,000 as we were told could be done, and practically nothing has been accomplished in the way of legislation.

The leaders of Congress are in confusion among themselves and have not agreed upon any major legislation, which we had promised. Just how Congress expects to carry out the program which the people of this country had expected us to carry out is beyond me. Putting it bluntly, we have failed in everything which we promised the voters, and in view of that situation, it is not surprising that the Gallup poll paints a picture which, to say the least, is disappointing to the Republican Party.

The Republicans swept the election on November 5, after 14 years of failure, and today, if the Gallup poll may be taken as an index, we are in the unenviable position of being once again in the minority. I predict that unless the Republicans come alive and carry out the promises that were made to the voters in that election, they will fail again when the next election comes around. This position is one which can be overcome if the Republicans will get together and agree upon the program which the people expect them to carry out and which can be carried out if we do agree.

We stated that we would reduce taxes by a substantial amount. We stated that we would remove some of the pay rollers who now clog the wheels of Government. We stated that we would do something about the labor situation, which the people are demanding. In all of these things we have failed to carry through and the Republican Party must keep their promises if they expect to be returned to power. No other explanation can be given to this switch in sentiment as evidenced by the Gallup poll. It is time for us to act and act quickly; and we may just as well recognize the realities which face our party.

CENSUSES OF MANUFACTURES, MINERAL INDUSTRIES, BUSINESS AND DISTRIBUTION, AND TRANSPORTATION

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair recognizes the Senator from Nevada.

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, I ask the indulgence of the Senate for a few minutes with respect to a matter which I consider to be of substantial importance.

I have introduced at this session of the Congress a bill (S. 6) to provide for censuses of manufactures, mineral industries, business and distribution, and transportation.

I ask unanimous consent that the text of Senate bill 6 may be inserted in the RECORD at this point as a part of my remarks.

There being no objection, the bill (S. 6) to provide for censuses of manufactures, mineral industries, business and distribution, and transportation, was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 17 of the act entitled "An act to provide for the fifteenth and subsequent decennial censuses and to provide for apportionment of Representatives in Congress," approved June 18, 1929, as amended, is hereby amended to read as follows: "That the Director of the Census be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to take, compile, and publish, for the year 1946 and every fifth year thereafter, a census of manufactures, a census of mineral industries, a census of business and distribution (including the distributive trades, warehouses and storages, and service establishments) and a census of transportation. The census of transportation herein provided for shall include statistics of the commercial transportation industries, including both contract and common carriers of persons or goods by highway, by waterway, and by air, but shall not include statistics of transportation by rail. Schedules used to take the censuses of manufactures, of mineral industries, and of business and distribution, provided for in this act, shall include inquiries designed to provide information as to the extent to which each establishment covered by each such census makes use in the conduct of its business of each of the principal means of transportation, namely, railways, highways, waterways, and air transportation; and the extent to which each such establishment furnishes its own transportation facilities, either through truck ownership and use, by waterway, or by any other means."

Mr. McCARRAN. Senate bill 6 is virtually identical with Senate bill 1705 which I introduced during the Seventy-ninth Congress.

I shall not take up the time of the Senate with a lengthy statement concerning this bill; but so that Senators may know my views concerning it, I ask unanimous consent that there be printed in the RECORD at this point, as a part of my remarks, the statement which I made with respect to the bill S. 1705 at the time I introduced it.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATEMENT BY SENATOR M'CARRAN

The need for authentic, up-to-date information of the nature which can be provided only by such censuses should be clear to every Senator.

Proposals for taking censuses of manufactures, of mineral industries, and of distribution and business already have been approved by the Secretary of Commerce and by the Census Bureau. The proposal for a census of transportation should have the endorsement of anyone who will take the time to think the matter through.

At the present time no Government agency has the sort of basic transportation statistics needed by the Congress, and by the executive departments, for rational transportation legislation, direction, and planning.

Transportation vitally affects the operations of every industry and individual, and is of intense current interest to Congress and to the executive agencies of the Federal Government.

The original census of 1790 covered population only. In later years the scope of census taking has been progressively broadened, as its importance in the national economy came to be recognized. Census taking has thus come to be acknowledged as the appropriate medium for collecting data, not otherwise available, for the use of the Congress, of executive branches of the Government, and of others in their study of our national problems. The Bureau of the Census was specifically created by the Congress as a national fact-finding agency. Down through the years it has proved helpful in many ways. Clearly, the time has come when the Congress should add to the functions of the Census Bureau to provide for the obtaining of the basic facts concerning transportation at periodic intervals. The taking of censuses on manufactures, mineral industries, wholesale and retail trade, and so on will provide unique opportunity to ascertain the transportation services used by each. Concurrently, there should be a census of both common-carrier and contract-carrier transportation, by highway, by waterway, and by air. The bill which I have just introduced provides for such a census.

This bill does not cover a census of rail transportation, since statistics on rail transportation are now gathered and compiled, adequately, by the Interstate Commerce Commission. The bill does cover motor-truck transportation, since the statistics on motor carriers gathered by the Interstate Commerce Commission are neither sufficiently comprehensive nor sufficiently detailed.

The importance of transportation in our national economy needs no argument. Nor is there any need to argue that the problems involved, in seeing to it that the true public interest is preserved in our national transportation policy, are both complex and serious. The solution of these problems is going to require a lot of straight, hard thinking. To be realistic, this thinking must be based on the most adequate body of factual data which it is possible for the Congress and the executive branches of the Government to assemble.

Recognition of the complexity of our transportation problems, and the need for searching analysis to arrive at proper solutions thereof, is demonstrated by the fact that the Senate now has before it at least two resolutions calling for transportation investigations. In the other House of the Congress, the Committee on Interstate Commerce is reported to be working actively on such an investigation.

Yet, as I have pointed out, no Government agency has in hand, or is currently gathering, anything approaching adequate transportation statistics. For example, nowhere are data available as to the relative use which manufacturers in a given line make of railways, highways, waterways, and air transportation facilities, in the assembling of materials and in the shipment of products. The same holds true of mineral industries, retail trade, wholesale trade, and other businesses.

In short, there is no way of measuring, on the basis of currently available data, the contributions which the various kinds of transportation are making to industry and business, either by kinds or by geographic locations. Nor are data available showing the extent to which manufacturers, businessmen, farmers, and others furnish their own transportation through truck ownership and use.

If the role of transportation in our national economy is of sufficient importance to warrant serious study by the Congress and by several of the executive departments, it would seem entirely logical and in keeping with sound legislative procedure for the Bureau of the Census to be now instructed to assemble the basic facts on transportation.

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, some departments and agencies of the Federal Government reported adversely on this bill during the Seventy-ninth Congress, notably the Census Bureau and the Interstate Commerce Commission. The ICC, in my opinion, rather went out of its way to file a strongly-worded adverse report. Other departments and agencies of the Federal Government filed favorable reports. One of these favorable reports is particularly interesting, coming from the Commissioner of Public Roads, Mr. Thomas H. MacDonald. I ask unanimous consent that Mr. MacDonald's letter, with enclosures, be printed in the RECORD at this point as a part of my remarks.

There being no objection, the letter and enclosures were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

FEDRAL WORKS AGENCY,
PUBLIC ROADS ADMINISTRATION,
Washington, February 21, 1946.

Hon. PAT MCCARRAN,
United States Senate.

MY DEAR SENATOR MCCARRAN: It is a pleasure to comply with the request in your letter of January 12 for my personal opinion on the matters covered by your bill S. 1705. I am in hearty accord with your objectives as I understand them from a reading of the bill and with the remarks you made on the floor of the Senate at the time you introduced it.

You have pointed to one of the weakest spots—if not in fact the weakest—in the whole general field of Government statistics. In my years of contact with transportation, one fact stands out as prominently as any. That is that while numerous responsible Government officials (including the late Mr. Joseph B. Eastman) have repeatedly and forcibly emphasized the urgent need for more adequate Government transportation statistics, relatively little has been done about the matter. In spite of the expansion and improvement in the Government's statistical program in other lines, and in spite of new developments in transportation, Government data on transportation still remain inadequate.

Hence, it is heartening that you have determined that the Government should develop an adequate factual basis for evaluating the transportation practices and needs of the Nation. Such facts are perhaps more urgently needed at the present time than ever before, especially because the Congress is being urged to adopt legislation which would radically alter the traditional relationships existing between the various transport agencies.

Your bill, S. 1705, is, in my opinion, very well phrased to insure that the Congress and the interested Government agencies will have available the essential data for analysis prior to consideration of any proposed changes in our national transportation legislation and policy.

The Public Roads Administration has repeatedly urged the Bureau of the Budget and the Bureau of the Census to incorporate transportation inquiries in the schedules used in the various censuses. In recommending that the Bureau of the Census gather the essential data, we had in mind that, while our own needs for the information were such as to warrant our undertaking to obtain it at first hand, the census method would be more economical and would also make the data available on a Nation-wide and uniform basis for other interested agencies.

Thus specifically in 1939 we recommended that such inquiries be included in the 1940 census of agriculture, manufactures, business, or distribution, and of service establishments. Had these inquiries been included, it very likely would not have been necessary for the Public Roads Administration, at the request of the War Department, to conduct the Nation-wide inventory of trucks and busses in the fall of 1941 in anticipation of the possible need of mobilization of such equipment in the event of war.

Again in 1944 we recommended that transportation inquiries be included in the 1945 census of agriculture. When it was thought that there might be a census of manufactures in 1946 covering the year 1945, we repeated our earlier requests.

And when in October 1945 we learned of the proposal to ask the authorization of the Congress for rather complete censuses of industry and business to be taken in 1947, a letter renewing our earlier suggestions was immediately sent to Director Capt by Mr. H. S. Fairbank, deputy commissioner of research. A copy of this letter is attached for your information and that of your staff, as are also copies of letters referring to our earlier proposals. In November I personally called Secretary Wallace's attention to the matter, as did Maj. Gen. Philip B. Fleming, Administrator of the Federal Works Agency. Copies of these letters are also attached.

Your request that I give you my suggestions concerning the wording of the bill and a summary of arguments in favor of or against specific provisions is very much appreciated. To do this in detail would be beyond the scope of a letter, but we are having prepared, by a member of our staff who has been working directly on this matter, a more detailed statement covering objectives, needs for the data, and methods for its collection, together with some of the arguments which have been advanced against these proposals. I shall be glad to forward a copy of this statement to you as soon as it is completed.

In the meantime, may I suggest the desirability of assuring that the language of your bill is sufficiently broad in scope to assure coverage of airports, truck and bus terminals, taxicabs, and the city transit industry.

Very truly yours,

THOS. H. MACDONALD,
Commissioner of Public Roads.

MARCH 9, 1939.

Hon. WILLIAM L. AUSTIN,
Director, Bureau of the Census,
United States Department of Commerce, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. AUSTIN: The Bureau of Public Roads in various States which are cooperating in the highway planning surveys has found the various data gathered by the Bureau of the Census to be of great value in this work.

Several months ago certain recommendations as to inquiries which we feel it desirable to have included in the next census of agriculture were forwarded to the Department of Agriculture Committee on the Census.

At that time the committee instructed our representatives to forward direct to the office such suggestions as we care to make on the census of business and the census of manufacturing.

Our recommendations as to these two censuses are herewith submitted in duplicate, and their careful consideration by yourself and staff will be greatly appreciated. While the recommendations are probably self-explanatory for the greater part, the following comments may help to set forth our interest in having these data secured:

The highway planning surveys have as their purpose a determination of: (a) Existing highway facilities; (b) how and by whom and to what extent these highways are used; (c) limitations on desirable highway use due to inadequate or improperly located highways; and (d) on the basis of the above facts properly analyzed, a determination of immediate and future highway developments and improvements. The county maps now being developed as part of the road inventory and showing all public roads by type with cities and villages, farm homes, rail and waterways, country schools, churches, stores, etc., properly located, will furnish the first really complete transportation maps ever available. Adding to these data those on the use of highways by farmers, townspeople, manufacturers, wholesalers, and retailers will enable the Bureau of Public Roads and the cooperating States to present such a picture of the present and potential highway transportation situation as is absolutely essential for the formulation of intelligent State and Government policies with regard to highway development.

I wish to direct your personal attention particularly to one set of inquiries, namely, those covering the use of motor vehicles by manufacturers, wholesalers, and retailers. There is at present no source to which Government or State agencies working on highway or other transportation problems can now turn for authentic Nation-wide data as to the extent to which industrial plants and wholesale and retail establishments use or are served by motor vehicles and roads. In our opinion such data must be gathered by some Federal agency and we believe that the Bureau of the Census is the logical organization to undertake this work. Such data as we recommend securing would go far toward eliminating guess work from thinking and talking about the national and State transportation problems.

If the 1940 census is to cover the motor trucking and motor bus businesses we should appreciate an opportunity of also making recommendations concerning the schedules to be used.

Very truly yours,

H. S. FAIRBANKS,
Chief, Division of Information.

SEPTEMBER 19, 1944.

Mr. STUART RICE,
Assistant Director, Division of Statistical Standards, Bureau of the Budget,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. RICE: This is with further reference to our letter of September 7, 1944, urging that use be made of the 1945 census of manufactures in obtaining much-needed information concerning manufacturer's transportation methods. The attached material indicates, in a tentative manner, the sorts of inquiries which we believe would be instrumental in developing the data needed.

Page 1 of this material is identical with the enclosure in the letter of the above-mentioned date and sets forth the values and probable uses of such data. Pages 2 and 3 contain the proposed inquiries. As will be noted from the context it is not our idea that the inquiries need to be worded in exactly this manner, but they do serve to indicate more in detail what we have in mind.

If it is so desired the Public Roads Administration will be glad to cooperate with your office and the Bureau of the Census in developing the exact form of inquiries to be used and also instructions to the field force. If such assistance is desired or if further information is needed concerning the intent and purpose of the inquiries and proposed uses of the data either my office may be contacted or the matter may be taken up direct with Mr. Charles D. Bohannan of our staff. Mr. Bohannan's room number is 3015, Federal Works Building, branch 4825.

Very truly yours,

H. S. FAIRBANK,
Deputy Commissioner, Public Roads Administration.

OCTOBER 15, 1945.

Dr. STUART RICE,
Director, Division of Statistical Standards, Bureau of the Budget,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR DR. RICE: Enclosed is copy of letter just written to Director Capt, of the Bureau of the Census. The letter is probably chiefly self-explanatory, as it consists essentially of a repetition of our recommendations for the inclusion of transportation and motor vehicles inquiries on schedules used with manufacturers, wholesalers, retailers, and service establishments.

Also, we are requesting that serious consideration be given to conducting a census of transportation at the same time the census of manufactures and census of business are taken. We understand that plans are now being laid for such censuses in the year 1947 covering the year 1946.

While the Public Roads Administration realizes that such inquiries and the proposed census would require a considerable amount of time and effort in their planning and a considerable expenditure of public funds to carry them out, we believe that at the present juncture in our national economy such effort and expenditure would be more than justified. It occurs to us that there is no other means which would be as feasible nor in the long run as economical to obtain data which are so urgently needed in transportation planning and the development of the transportation policy.

Because of the importance which we attach to this matter we are again glad to offer both to the Bureau of the Budget and the Census such technical or advisory assistance as may be desired, either in the preliminary work of drawing up the proposed forms and in drafting statements as to the need for such census data or in the further stages if the census be approved and carried through.

Very truly yours,

H. S. FAIRBANK,
Deputy Commissioner, Public Roads Administration.

OCTOBER 15, 1945.

Mr. J. C. CAPT,
Director, Bureau of the Census,
Department of Commerce,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. CAPT: Further reference is made to our letters of January 26 and February 1, 1945, in which we urged the advisability of utilizing the opportunities presented by the taking of a census of manufactures and a census of business, in procuring much needed information on transportation.

We have been informed that provision was not made by the Congress for taking either the census of manufactures nor the census of business covering the year 1945. However, we also understand that at present plans are being laid looking toward a rather complete census of manufactures and also of business and service establishments covering the year 1946.

Hence the Public Roads Administration wishes to repeat in substantially the same form the recommendation that transportation inquiries be incorporated in the schedules used in obtaining data from manufacturers, wholesalers, retailers, and the various kinds of service establishments.

We also wish to propose that serious consideration be given to incorporating in the census plans definite provision for a census of transportation covering the various classes of for-hire truckers, bus operators, city transit lines, and for-hire carriers by water, at least on the inland waterways and coastwise.

Data as to railways are probably already sufficiently covered by their reports to the ICC and as to airways by reports to the Civil Aeronautics Board. The scope and extent of the activities of the other transport agencies above mentioned are not, however, so adequately reported on to any of the various Government agencies as to enable an accurate analysis of their importance in the national economy, either in absolute terms or as to the relative contribution of each in the movement of persons and goods, employment, wages, expenditures for plant, equipment, supplies, etc.

It is scarcely necesary, I presume, to do more than merely point out the desirability from the standpoint of governmental policy determination of having available a more comprehensive factual body of data on transportation than now exists in any governmental agency. We believe, as we have previously stated, that such data would not only be of great value in the work of the Public Roads Administration but also in that of several other Federal agencies concerned with transportation matters. The lack of sufficiently broad and related data on numerous phases of transportation has repeatedly been pointed out by responsible officials of various agencies, including the late Joseph Eastman, when Coordinator of Transportation.

A census of transportation such as here contemplated would provide data which, put together with those resulting from the recommended inquiries to manufacturers, business and service establishments, would furnish for the first time something approaching an adequate factual background concerning this highly essential and at the same time highly controversial phase of our economic life.

During the recent war emergency there were many occasions on which adequate data on transport agencies, methods of shipment, etc., would have materially facilitated the work of numerous agencies. Now, that victory has been achieved, there is almost as urgent a need for such data in planning for the transitional period and future development. The two Houses of Congress already have before them several resolutions calling for transportation investigations.

We fully realize that a considerable amount of expense would be involved in carrying out the proposals which we have made. However, the matter of transportation planning and direction is so essential and the need so urgent for more complete data that, in our opinion, such additional expenditures would be more than justified. Further, it seems to us that the most feasible, and in the long run the most economical, way for the Government to provide itself with such data is in connection with the taking of the various censuses.

Copy of this letter is being sent to the Bureau of the Budget, which was also furnished copy of our earlier recommendations. We shall be glad to have an opportunity to discuss, both with you and the Bureau of the Budget, the needs for and the practicability of the proposals. Further, we are again glad to offer such technical assistance from our staff as may be desired in connection with the proper framing of the inquiries and schedules, instructions to enumerators, editing, coding, tabulation procedures, etc.

Because of our keen interest in this matter we have authorized Mr. Bohannan, of our research staff, to devote as much time as seems desirable, both in the exploratory phases of the work and its final phases, if such a census is approved and carried through. Mr. Bohannan not only is acquainted with our needs in the matter and familiar with the problems and practices of both for hire and private carriers, but also, as you may know, has some familiarity with census problems and procedures due to his previous work with that bureau.

Very truly yours,

H. S. FAIRBANK,
Deputy Commissioner, Public Roads Administration.

NOVEMBER 7, 1945.

The Honorable HENRY A. WALLACE,
Secretary of Commerce.

MY DEAR MR. SECRETARY: Commissioner MacDonald of the Public Roads Administration has called to my attention recommendations of that agency regarding certain additions to the schedules of the censuses of manufactures, business, and service establishments that are proposed to be taken in 1947 to cover the year 1946. The recommendations are directed toward the obtaining for the first time of an adequate body of data on transportation so that the importance of the various modes of transportation to the various types of business and industry and upon the economy of the entire Nation may be evaluated.

I wish to endorse Mr. MacDonald's recommendations. It seems to me that the information that he proposes be collected is essential to the establishment of a sound program of public works and would be invaluable to regulatory bodies and to all other agencies, private and public, concerned with the transportation problem. I am calling the subject to your personal attention because of your interest in transportation and your recognition of its importance in a healthy economy.

If you feel that it is desirable, I should be glad to present my views to the Director of the Budget.

Sincerely yours.

PHILIP B. FLEMING,
Major General, United States Army, Administrator.

NOVEMBER 8, 1945.

The Honorable HENRY A. WALLACE,
Secretary of Commerce.

MY DEAR MR. SECRETARY: It is understood that plans are now being developed for censuses of manufactures and of business and service establishments, to be taken in 1947 covering the year 1946. The Public Roads Administration is keenly interested in these plans for the official data on industry and trade by kinds, size of establishments, and geographic location resulting from previous censuses have been of considerable value in planning the national and State highway systems.

The value of the census data in our work and in that of all the State highway departments, as well as in many other Government agencies, would be greatly increased, however, by the extension of the coverage to include information on transportation. Nowhere, in Government or elsewhere, are adequate statistics available on the various phases of this important segment of our economy. The desired result could be accomplished by adding to the schedules certain inquiries on transportation and motor-vehicle ownership, and by taking concurrently a separate census of transportation covering for-hire highway and waterway carriers.

Our recommendations have already been transmitted in some detail to Director Capt, and to the Bureau of the Budget, in letters of which copies are attached. Following these recommendations will produce a body of data on transportation invaluable to us in our own work, and of great value also to all other agencies, public and private, concerned with transportation.

While I have no doubt that Director Capt will give full consideration to our suggestions because of the importance we attach to the subject, I wish to call your personal attention to it and to repeat Mr. Fairbank's offer to Director Capt to assist in the development of the schedules or in any other way we can.

Sincerely yours,

THOS. H. MACDONALD,
Commissioner of Public Roads.

Mr. McCARRAN. I mentioned previously, Mr. President, that the Interstate Commerce Commission had filed a strong adverse report on my bill S. 1705. The Commission was prompt to file another adverse report on the bill S. 6, in this session of the Congress. I ask unanimous consent that the report from the Interstate Commerce Commission, on S. 6, be printed in the RECORD at this point as a part of my remarks.

There being no objection, the report was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

INTERSTATE COMMERCE COMMISSION,
Washington, January 24, 1947.

Hon. WALLACE H. WHITE, Jr.,
Chairman, Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR CHAIRMAN WHITE: Mr. Jarrett's letter of January 15, addressed to the Chairman of the Commission and requesting comments on S. 6, introduced by Senator McCARRAN, "To provide for censuses of manufactures, mineral industries, business and distribution, and transportation," has been referred to our legislative committee. After careful consideration by that committee, I am authorized to submit the following comments in its behalf:

S. 6 is identical in wording with S. 1705 (79th Cong., 1st sess.). S. 6 would provide for a quinquennial census of manufactures, including among other things a census of transportation, which "shall include statistics of the commercial transportation industries, including both contract and common carriers of persons or goods by highway, by waterway, and by air, but shall not include statistics of transportation by rail." The bill further would provide for inquiries designed to provide information as to the extent to which each establishment covered by the censuses of manufactures, of mineral industries, and of business and distribution "makes use in the conduct of its business of each of the principal means of transportation, namely, railways, highways, waterways, and air transportation; and the extent to which each such establishment furnishes its own transportation facilities, either through truck ownership and use, by waterway, or by any other means." The foregoing provisions relating to transportation are of principal interest to us.

We question the desirability of the proposed census which would embrace statistics relating to common and contract carriers by motor vehicle and by water engaged in interstate commerce. Such carriers now file with this Commission annual statistical reports, which are available for public inspection. The Commission currently publishes statistical compilations based on these reports. The duplication of the statistics in census reports would entail unnecessary expense to the Government and would be burdensome to the carriers. As the census would be taken only every 5 years, the statistics so compiled would soon be superseded by the statistics reported annually to this Commission and compiled by it. This consideration was presumably the reason for excepting railroad statistics from the bill, and the fact that it applies equally to motor and water carriers may have been overlooked.

We therefore suggest that the bill be amended by deleting the words "of transportation by rail", in line 7 of page 2, and substituting therefor the words "of common and contract carriers and freight forwarders subject to the Interstate Commerce Act, as amended."

The provision for collecting information concerning the kind of transportation facilities utilized by business establishments would, no doubt, disclose facts which would be of some interest to us. It is not clear, however, from an examination of the bill what statistics of the commercial transportation industries, not including railroads, are to be included in the transport census. Offhand, it appears that the Civil Aeronautics Board, the Board of Engineers for Rivers and Harbors, the Maritime Commission, and this Commission publish annually practically all the statistics that would be collected by such a census from air, waterway, and highway carriers, excepting only those highway commercial transportation enterprises which do not file reports with the Commission. Subject to this possible qualification, therefore, it does not appear that anything would be gained by the census of transportation that is now proposed.

Respectfully submitted.

WALTER M. W. SPLAWN,
Chairman, Legislative Committee.
CHARLES D. MAHAFFIE.
JOHN L. ROGERS.

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, after the Interstate Commerce Commission had filed an adverse report on my bill, S. 1705, during the last session of the Congress, I addressed a letter to the chairman of the Commission asking for information from which I hoped it would be possible to determine the extent of the Commission's coverage in the field of transportation statistics. I received a reply which, in my opinion, should be read in connection with the Commission's adverse report on S. 6. I therefore ask unanimous consent that my letter to the chairman of the Interstate Commerce Commission under date of March 19, 1946, and his reply thereto, be printed in the RECORD at this point as a part of my remarks.

There being no objection, the correspondence was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

MARCH 19, 1946.

Mr. JOHN L. ROGERS,
Chairman, Interstate Commerce Commission, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: I shall appreciate it very much if you can furnish me with the following information:

1. What is the total number of motor carriers in the United States?

2. What is the number of interstate motor carriers in class 1?

3. What is the number of interstate motor carriers in each of classes 2 and 3?

4. What is the number of interstate motor carriers exempted under the Federal statutes?

5. What is the number of intrastate motor carriers in the United States?

6. What is the number of private motor carriers in the United States?

7. From how many motor carriers does the Commission receive periodic reports, and in what periods?

Thanking you in advance for your attention to this request for information, and with kindest regards, I am,

Sincerely,

PAT MCCARRAN.

INTERSTATE COMMERCE COMMISSION,
Washington, March 29, 1946.

Hon. PAT MCCARRAN,
United States Senate,
Washington, D.C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: This has reference to your letter of March 19, 1946, in which you asked for information on seven tabulated questions concerning the number of motor carriers. The following answers to question Nos. 2, 3, and 7 are taken from this Commission's records. The answers to the other questions are partly estimates, and have been taken from data published by the Office of Defense Transportation, based upon certificates of war necessity issued by that organization to August 31, 1944. Exact current figures are not available.

1. What is the total number of motor carriers in the United States?

Office of Defense Transportation certificates issued to property carriers	3,334,394
Same for local and suburban bus operators	4,439
Same for intercity bus operators	2,312
Same for private-school bus operators	27,000
Same for Government school bus operators	23,000
Same for taxicab operators	32,460
Total	3,423,655

These figures include private carriers. Included in the certificates issued to property carriers are 40,701 certificates issued to Federal, State, and municipal governments, but not including the armed forces. These certificates covered 233,935 vehicles. The above table does not include 26,899 certificates issued to persons operating ambulances and hearses.

2. What is the number of interstate motor carriers in class 1?

Property carriers	2,168
Passenger carriers	397
Total	2,565

3. What is the number of interstate motor carriers in each of classes 2 and 3?

Class 2 property carriers	3,843
Class 2 passenger carriers	279
Total	4,122
Class 3 property carriers	14,897
Class 3 passenger carriers	830
Total	15,727

4. What is the number of interstate motor carriers exempted under the Federal statutes?

Property carriers	20,000
Passenger carriers	700
Total	20,700

These figures are estimates based upon bus and truck inventory issued by the Public Roads Administration for the year 1941, and the certificates issued by the Office of Defense Transportation.

5. What is the number of intrastate motor carriers in the United States?

Carriers of property for hire	282,587
Carriers of passengers for hire	87,724
Total	371,311

It is assumed that this question refers to motor carriers for hire.

6. What is the number of private motor carriers in the United States?

Private carriers of property	2,932,765

No data are available on private carriers of passengers.

The above figure includes approximately 1,000,000 farmers who operate trucks in connection with, but not exclusively on, their farms.

7. From how many motor carriers does the Commission receive periodic reports, and in what periods?

All class 1 carriers (2,565) file annual and quarterly accounting reports, and monthly reports of excess hours of service of drivers.

All class 1 carriers of passengers (397) also file monthly accounting reports.

The above figures are the latest that are available and to the extent that estimates are used, they are based upon the best information available.

Very truly yours,

GEORGE M. BARNARD,
Chairman.

Mr. MCCARRAN. Mr. President, I do not want to burden the RECORD unduly, and so I shall not ask to have printed various favorable reports on the bill, S. 6, which have been made to the Senate committee to which the bill has been referred. I do, however, wish to call the attention of the Senate to a report just submitted by the panel on motor-transport statistics of the Subcommittee on Transportation of the Federal Committee on Economic Statistics. This report has, I am informed, been accepted by the Subcommittee on Transportation of the Federal Committee on Economic Statistics. In some of the reports from governmental agencies last year, on my bill, S. 1705, it was suggested that action on the question of taking a census of transportation should await completion of studies being made by an interdepartmental board or committee, under the direction of the Budget Bureau, the purpose of which was to determine the need for such statistics. The report which I hold in my hand is the end product of that study, according to my best information; and, in my opinion, this report is full and complete justification for taking the census which I have proposed. I therefore ask unanimous consent that this report may be included in the RECORD at this point as a part of my remarks.

FEDERAL COMMITTEE ON ECONOMIC STATISTICS, SUBCOMMITTEE ON TRANSPORTATION—REPORT OF THE PANEL ON MOTOR TRANSPORT STATISTICS—FEDERAL STATISTICS ON MOTOR TRANSPORT—PRESENT STATUS, DEFICIENCIES, AND RECOMMENDATIONS

The report herewith was unanimously adopted by the panel on motor transport on February 14, 1947, presented to and unanimously adopted by the Subcommittee on Transportation February 19, 1947.

SUMMARY OF FINDINGS AND RECOMMENDATIONS

1. Present Federal statistics on motor transport are inadequate.

2. Really adequate data should be of considerable value to the Congress, numerous Federal agencies, and the public.

3. The only part of the motor carrier industry now covered by regularly recurring reports to any Federal agency are those made to the ICC by the larger or class I interstate for-hire carriers. The exact total number of all for-hire carriers is unknown. Estimates indicate that the reports to ICC may cover only about 2 percent of the for-hire carriers of property and 8 percent of the for-hire carriers of passengers.

4. To provide adequate Federal statistical coverage for both for-hire and private motor carriers it is recommended:

(a) That ICC secure annual reports from the class II and III interstate for-hire carriers now under its jurisdiction.

(b) That statistics on exempt interstate for-hire carriers and intrastate for-hire carriers be obtained through a census of for-hire transportation, the first to be taken in 1948, covering 1947.

(c) That statistics on private carriers; i. e., industries, businesses, etc., which operate trucks or busses in connection with their business be obtained by inclusion of appropriate inquiries at the taking of each census of manufactures, business, mines, warehouses and storages, service businesses, agriculture, etc.

(d) That subsequent censuses of for-hire transportation be taken as of the same year or years as covered by the censuses referred to in "c" above.

(e) That the reports issued by the Bureau of the Census incorporate the basic data from the reports rendered to the ICC to the end that there may be available for the use of Government and the public uniform statistics on motor carriage of property and passengers.

The Panel on Motor Transport Statistics will appreciate receiving any critical comments or constructive suggestions which you may care to offer. Such statements might well include comments as to the value which you feel such statistics and reports might have in connection with your own official work or business. They should be addressed to:

CHARLES D. BOHANNAN,
Chairman, Panel on Motor Transport Statistics, Public Roads Administration.

FEDERAL STATISTICS ON MOTOR TRANSPORT—PRESENT STATUS, DEFICIENCIES, AND RECOMMENDATIONS

PRESENT FEDERAL STATISTICS ARE INADEQUATE

This simple, and perhaps blunt-sounding statement, highlights not only the concensus of this panel but also of numerous administrative and research persons in various Federal agencies.

This opinion as to the general inadequacy of motor-transport statistics and the need of making provision for really adequate data on this very important aspect of transportation is known to be shared by numerous nongovernmental organizations, firms, and individuals

The situation has, in fact, been characterized by some as being probably one of the weakest spots in the whole Federal statistical program.

Adequate data on both for-hire and private carriers necessary as they were, and are felt still to be, for rational transportation and industrial planning during peacetimes are of outstanding importance during emergency such as war. During the war just closed the lack of such data seriously handicapped and delayed numerous phases of war planning and frequently important decisions had to be made on the basis of rather hurriedly prepared estimates, some of them with but too little factual data on which to rest. In other cases hasty surveys of a particular phase of the field were made and some of these were subject to the difficulties inherent in any survey necessarily made under the pressure of urgent need and the lack of broad basic data as a starting point.

PREVIOUS GOVERNMENT STATISTICAL COVERAGE

Some Federal agencies and individuals had in fact some time prior to the war recognized the urgent need for more comprehensive data and had worked on the problem either through their own agencies or by attempting to obtain the cooperation of other Federal agencies therein.

Here mention should be made of the work of the Federal Coordinator of Transportation, the late Mr. Eastman, whose staff reports provided some very helpful data on certain aspects of motor transport. The Public Roads Administration (then Bureau) of its own initiative and in cooperation with various States had made highway transport surveys in a number of States at even an earlier date, each of which developed significant data—again valuable but also fragmentary.

The Highway Planning Surveys inaugurated in 1936, and conducted by each of the 48 States in cooperation with PRA furnished extremely valuable data on various phases of highway transport including the largest sample ever taken of truck movements, loadings, and so forth.

In 1935 the Bureau of the Census as part of the Census of Business conducted a Census of Motor Trucking for Hire and of Motor Bus Transportation.

Also during this period the Interstate Commerce Commission, under the Motor Carrier Act, 1935, began a collection and publication of data on motor carriers subject to its jurisdiction.

The Bureau of Internal Revenue compiles and releases annual financial data from the tax returns of several thousand corporations engaged in the several types of transportation, including separate itemization of some phases of for-hire motor transport.

The PRA also made urgent recommendations that inquiries on truck ownership and use be incorporated in the schedules for the censuses of agriculture, manufactures, and business in connection with the 1940 Census. Although these recommendations were joined in by some other Federal agencies, and numerous nongovernment groups the attempt thus to secure data, later most vitally needed, was not successful.

Subsequently the PRA at the request of the Highway Traffic Advisory Committee to the War Department conducted in cooperation with the States a truck and bus inventory, covering data as of the year end of 1941. This was essentially an equipment inventory and additionally showed the principal commodities for which trucks were used and differentiated between publicly owned, private not for-hire, and for-hire trucks.

Some valuable data are also available in the compilations made by ODT from the certificates of war necessity covering the year of 1944.

The USDA and some of the State agricultural experiment stations have for years, in connection with studies of marketing and transportation developed data and reports containing much valuable information on motor carriage of property—especially farm products. These studies have, however, necessarily been limited as to area, time, and information coverage.

NO RECENT COMPREHENSIVE COVERAGE

Yet in spite of the very valuable character of the data assembled by the above-mentioned and other Federal agency studies, because of their nature, limitations of scope, and the time element it still remains true that no Federal or other agency has in its possession the kinds of data on motor transport deemed essential.

With the exception of the class I interstate carriers now reporting to ICC the words of Mr. Eastman are still true, when he said, in his fourth report as coordinator, "no satisfactory data are available with respect to persons and property carried and labor employed in highway motor-vehicle transportation." As noted in the more detailed discussion of for-hire carriers even the reports on class I interstate carriers of property are lacking in commodity data.

POTENTIAL FEDERAL USERS OF THE DATA IF ADEQUATE

Because of the obvious importance of motor transport in the industrial and total economy of the Nation and the present inadequacy of the data thereon the panel feels that on this point of potential users of the data it is sufficient merely to mention some of the Federal agencies which feel the need thereof without going into detail as to the exact kind of uses which each agency might probably make of the data. Undoubtedly once adequate data are available, new and perhaps unsuspected uses will be found for them.

As of the present, the following may be listed as having a known active interest in motor transport data as well as in transportation data in general.

The Congress.

The War and Navy Departments.

The Federal Works Agency—Public Roads Administration.

Department of Agriculture—Production and Marketing Administration and Bureau of Agricultural Economics.

Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce.

Interstate Commerce Commission.

The Bureau of Mines.

The Bureau of Internal Revenue.

The Bureau of Labor Statistics.

The panel accordingly recommends that provision be made for supplying the evident need for more comprehensive data on transportation by motor carriers. This coverage should include both the carriage of persons and of property.

It is suggested that for the present the coverage of carriers by motor of passengers be confined to for-hire carriers—including all such carriers whether interstate, intrastate, or local.

The coverage of motor transport of property should include both for-hire carriers (including exempt) and private carriers.

For-hire carriers by motor are, as implied in the term, individuals, partnerships, corporations, et al., which set themselves up to perform transport service for others in return for compensation.

As pointed out more fully in subsequent pages, there are numerous kinds and classes of these for-hire carriers. No one knows with any assurance the approximate number of such carriers.

Private carriers of property by motor are individuals, partnerships, corporations, et al., which for one reason or another furnish part or all of their own motor transport service. Included in this category are manufacturers, mines, wholesale, retail, and service establishments, and farmers.

While the Bureau of the Census and other agencies do from time to time publish data as to the total number of these and other kinds of industry and business, there are with very limited exceptions no Government data showing the number and percent of such firms which furnish part or all of their own motor carrier transport, the amount of for-hire transport service used (motor, rail, water, or airway), the number of motor vehicles owned and operated, nor how these matters vary from business to business by kind, size, or geographic location.

Some general clue as to the relative number of vehicles used in private motor carriage and for-hire motor carriage of property may be obtained from the fact that the truck and bus inventory showed that 83 percent of all trucks reported were used privately and not for-hire, and by the further fact that in the compilations made from the ODT data covering 1944 only 13 percent of the trucks were classed as being used for-hire.

STATUS OF THE FEDERAL STATISTICS ON MOTOR CARRIERS FOR HIRE

I. Classes and number of for-hire carriers

Federal statistics on for-hire carriers by motor are, as a whole, quite inadequate. Even the number of for-hire carriers of property and of persons is not of record, nor, excepting only the larger interstate for-hire carriers, are any up-to-date Federal statistics available as to size and scope of business, the number of vehicles used, amount and kind of commodities or number of persons hauled, number and compensation of employees, and other such data as would serve to indicate their importance in the national economy or the role played by them in furnishing transportation service.

In discussions of matters pertaining to this industry two general classifications are made use of; namely, interstate for-hire carriers and intrastate for-hire carriers. Intrastate carriers are such carriers as operate wholly within a single State and do not have arrangements with other carriers for the through handling of shipments or persons moving across State lines. Many carriers engage in both inter- and intra-state operations.

Interstate carriers of property: Under the administration of the Motor Carrier Act by the Interstate Commerce Commission, the following classes of for-hire interstate carriers of property are recognized:

Class I, which includes those carriers whose average gross revenue from transportation by motor vehicle exceeds $100,000 per annum. There are approximately 2,100 class I carriers.

Class II, which includes those carriers whose average gross revenue from transportation by motor vehicle is $25,000 or more but under $100,000 per annum.

Class III, which includes those carriers whose average gross revenue from transportation by motor vehicle is less than $25,000 per annum. In class II and class III there are approximately 19,000 carriers.

In 1941, of an estimated total number of 22,500 class I, II, and III for-hire carriers of property, approximately 76 percent, or 17,100, were intercity in character and the remaining 24 percent, or 5,400, were local.

Exempt carriers, which engage primarily in the handling of unmanufactured agricultural commodities, livestock, fish (including shellfish), and farm cooperative associations. The only record of interstate carriers, which record is known to be incomplete, lists about 3,150 carriers.

Interstate carriers of passengers: For-hire carriers of persons are classified or grouped into similar classes:

Class I operators whose average gross revenues per annum exceed $100,000, 350 carriers, of which approximately 266 are classed as intercity, while the remaining 64 are classed as local.

Class II operators whose average gross revenues per annum are $25,000 but not more than $100,000.

Class III operators whose average gross revenues per annum are less than $25,000. There are approximately 1,220 class II and class III carriers of passengers.

Exempt are certain types of passenger carriers for hire, such as school buses and taxicabs.

Intrastate carriers: There are no Federal statistics available to show even a close approximation as to the total number of intrastate carriers of property. The situation is the same with respect to intrastate carriers of passengers. Some intrastate carriers for hire are not subject to regulation.

II. Extent of present statistical coverage

Class I interstate carriers are at present the only class of for-hire carriers of property and of passengers which regularly file accounting and statistical reports with the ICC or any other Federal agency.

According to the latest available information, the ICC is receiving such reports from 2,160 class I carriers of property and 350 carriers of passengers. The property carriers include approximately 1,600 intercity carriers and 500 local carriers; the passenger carriers include 266 intercity carriers and 84 local carriers.

Local carriers are carriers which perform for-hire transportation service within a municipality or contiguous municipalities. Carriers of property which derive 25 percent or more of their total operating revenues from local service are classified as local carriers.

Passenger carriers whose average fare is less than 20 cents are classified as local carriers.

Some indication of the limited extent of the coverage of the entire field of for-hire carriage of property which is afforded by the reports made to the ICC by class I interstate carriers may be found in the fact that in 1944 the owned power units of class I carriers represented approximately 10 percent of the total number of power units operated by all such carriers, both interstate and intrastate. A substantial number of other power units i used by class I carriers under leasing arrangements. It is to be noted that for-hire motor vehicles tend to be larger and to be operated more miles per annum than those used in private carriage.

The class I interstate for-hire carriers of persons regularly reporting to the ICC accounted for approximately 53 percent of all vehicles employed for hire in the intercity carriage of persons in both intrastate and interstate commerce in 1943, exclusive of those carriers wholly or preponderantly engaged in city or suburban service.

Other official data on for-hire trucking: As noted above, the only regularly recurring reports secured by any Federal agency are those made to the Interstate Commerce Commission by class I interstate carriers of freight and passengers. Some additional data have in the past been developed covering specific years, but no continuous series of data have resulted.

Of this sort of coverage, mention may be made of the ICC data obtained from the class II and III carriers of freight and passengers for the years 1939 to 1941, inclusive; the compilation made by ODT of pertinent data from the certificates of war necessity for 1944; the census of for-hire trucking and bus operations by the Bureau of the Census, 1935, and the truck and bus inventory conducted by Public Roads Administration for the Highway Advisory Committee of the War Department, the data for which covered the year 1941. The Highway Planning Surveys previously mentioned also provided some data on for-hire carriers.

The ICC report on class II and III carriers of property for 1941 included 21,300 such operators, and the data of for-hire carriers of passengers covered 1,287 operators.

Both the ODT compilation and the truck and bus inventory covered vehicles used in for-hire operations as well as those used for private operation. Neither of these, however, covered the general business statistics of the for-hire industry nor commodity data. Hence these reports, while containing some valuable data as of the years covered, fall short of providing adequate data on for-hire operations even for those years.

The marketing and transportation studies conducted by the United States Department of Agriculture and the Agricultural Experiment Stations, mentioned above, have included some valuable but fragmentary data on for-hire carriers of property.

Adequacy of present statistics on for-hire carriers: It is evident from the foregoing discussion that dependable recurring data on for-hire carriers by motor and their traffic, other than those in the class I category, are not presently available.

The reports (quarterly and annual) presently filed by class I carriers of property or passengers set out extensive balance-sheet and income information, expenses, etc.; equipment data; and operating statistics; and include data on number and compensation of employees.

With respect to the class I carriers of passengers, the panel believes that the data now obtained by the ICC are generally adequate. The panel believes that the data would have additional value for some users if it should prove practicable for the ICC to obtain data showing the number of passengers originating and terminating by States. The panel also believes that the reports as filed by class I carriers of property contain data which in general are adequate, except in the case of commodity data. The nearest approach to commodity statistics in the reports of class I carriers is found in the table dealing with carrier classification (general commodity haulers, carriers of household goods, petroleum, etc.). Such commodity data as are furnished, however, do not provide information on each of the major commodity groups.

It is believed by the majority of the panel that the reports issued on the basis of the data rendered might be made of greater value to users outside of the ICC if so set up as to show in greater detail the geographic distribution of the carriers, e. g., by States and cities. Further, in the event a census of for-hire motor carriers be taken, even if the class I carriers be excepted therefrom, the panel believes that the reports issued by the Census thereon should incorporate data from the ICC reports on class I carriers in order that the reports may constitute a uniform report of all classes of for-hire carriers.

Need for additional data: In view of the importance of for-hire transportation by motor vehicle in the economy of the country, it is necessary that more information be available with respect to numbers of carriers, numbers of units of equipment by types, miles operated, average length of haul, income and operating statistics, commodity data, and information of related character.

Various Federal agencies, as noted earlier in this report, need data of this type in the discharge of their statutory duties. Without such data any critical analysis of the role, in absolute terms or relatively, played by the various transport agencies is impossible. In times of national emergency, such information is essential for the proper distribution of critical materials, such as motor fuel, tires, and parts, as well as to determine the availability and location of motor vehicles of various kinds and types.

It is the opinion of the panel that not only Government, but industry and the public generally are concerned with such information. This is indicated by the many requests upon Government agencies for data of this kind.

The kinds of data needed: In general these may be characterized as being the kinds of data which will show the extent and scope of the for-hire motor-carrier industries—property and passengers. The data, methods of tabulating, etc., should be such as to result in reports on the economic characteristics of these industries somewhat similar to those now available through the Bureau of the Census on other segments of American business and industry.

The panel has not believed that it was essential at this time to set forth specifically and in detail each item which should be covered in a report form or schedule, nor to attempt to develop a tentative draft of such schedule. The panel does, however, wish to express its willingness both as a group and as to each member thereof to aid in preparing such schedules, the necessary instruction, etc., if this be the wish of the subcommittee or of any agency which may be intructed to obtain the data needed.

In summary, the data should cover:

I. The usual firm or individual identification.

II. The geographic location: (a) State, county, city, town, street adress; (b) the same for each establishment or terminal if operations are conducted out of more than one city address; (c) if a home office concern, the name and address thereof.

III. Names and addresses of any subsidiaries, affiliates, or parent companies.

IV. Date established—date coming under present ownership if not the original owners.

V. General character of operations as: Common: interstate, exempt, intrastate, local, regular or irregular routes; contract: ditto.

VI. Gross revenues:

(a) From trucking.

(b) From other kinds of business, with kind indicated and receipts therefrom.

VII. Employees and compensation: Officers and wage-earners, sex, occupational classification as practical.

VIII. Inventory of equipment by kind, type, capacity, age, etc.

IX. Operating expenses, total:

(a) Salaries and wages.

(b) Truck and tractor fuel—by kinds and amounts.

(c) Lubricating oils and greases.

(d) Rents.

(e) License, weight, fuel, and other operating taxes.

(f) Tires.

X. Commodity data:

Principal commodities hauled and tonnage, actual or estimated of each, together with area of distribution, e. g., States of origin and destination. Total tonnage hauled.

In the above list of data the panel has sought rather to indicate the sorts of data on motor transport which it believes are needed by some of the interested Government agencies than to indicate the detailed contents of a census schedule.

The panel is fully cognizant of the fact that any general schedule so developed as to make it applicable and practically useful with all members of the for-hire motor industry cannot furnish all the detailed statistics which some of the agencies find it desirable to have for their own work. To meet such special needs, such agencies may well need to develop intensive studies and analyses of certain segments of the field with the actual work generally done either by their own staffs or in cooperation with other interested agencies.

For example, to meet certain of the needs for additional details on commodity movement a special waybill sample study might be made to cover either the specific industry in which certain Government agencies are interested or specific geographic areas. Such studies are now in process regarding rail and water transportation. Moreover, the ICC has made such waybill studies in special areas; namely, the Western Trunk Line and Southern territories and similar studies in the other rate territories will go forward as rapidly as possible.

Further, in the case of the necessarily more detailed data needed, both by PRA and USDA on motor transport of farm products to processing plants, markets, etc., a joint undertaking of these two agencies might be considered.

RECOMMENDED PROCEDURES FOR OBTAINING THE DATA

It is evident that provision of adequate Federal statistics of the for-hire motor carrier industry must involve plans to procure such statistics on the very large segments of the industry not now covered.

Recapitulation of the status quo may be helpful at this point.

Presently covered: The only part of the industry on which any regularly recurring statistical reports are made to any Federal agency is class I interstate carriers of property and passengers now reporting to ICC—totaling about 2,450 carriers. Class I carriers of property account for more than 60 percent of the revenues of class I–III carriers and class I carriers of passengers account for more than 80 percent of the revenue of class I–III carriers of passengers.

Presently not covered: Class II and class III interstate carriers of property and passengers under jurisdiction of ICC, but not rendering regular reports—about 20,200.

Exempt interstate carriers of property (3,150 of record with ICC, but by some estimated to number 15,000 to 20,000). Intrastate carriers—of which it is believed there may be close to 100,000 carriers of property.

The panel makes the following recommendations:

1. Interstate carriers under ICC jurisdiction:

(a) That the ICC incorporate in its reporting forms for class I carriers of property inquiries which will develop additional commodity data.

This gap might be filled in part by having motor carriers report the volume of commodities handled under truckload rates. This distribution of truckload shipments, taken together with the carrier's present statement of total commodities carried, would also provide information as to aggregate volume of l. t. l. shipments. The data thus furnished by the motor carriers might be tabulated by the ICC on the basis of classification similar to the AAR freight-commodity classification.

(b) That the ICC should require annual reports from class II and class III carriers, both of property and passengers. The report forms might in general follow the pattern of those used in 1939–41 with certain amplifications and modifications.

(c) That annually the ICC should publish reports based on the above data and that the arrangement of the tabulations and form of the reports should give due consideration to such method of presentation as would make them of maximum value to the user agencies and to the general public.

2. Exempt interstate carriers; and

3. Intrastate carriers.

These two classes of carriers are not subject to the jurisdiction of the ICC with the exception of safety and hours of service in case of the exempt interstate carrier. Nor are data reported by them to any Federal agency. Hence the situation with respect to plans for securing the recommended kinds of data is essentially different.

Manifestly, what is needed is as complete coverage as possible and the development of comprehensive reports in which there may be incorporated the essence of the business statistics reported to the ICC by carriers under their jurisdiction.

The panel recommends as the most feasible and practical method of obtaining the data that the Bureau of the Census periodically take a census of only the above classes of carriers.

This should include the complete or full census at each 5-year interval plus limited annual survey.

The quinquennial census of for-hire motor carriers should coincide with the quinquennial census of manufactures, mineral industries, business, including construction and service, and warehousing and storage.

It is further recommended that the first such census of exempt and intrastate for-hire carriers be taken in 1948 covering the year 1947. It is realized that this first census would probably necessarily be rather limited as to commodity data because of the condition of the carriers' records.

It has been suggested that in lieu of a census of such transportation the interested Federal agencies prepare a questionnaire and request cooperation of State regulatory commissions in serving the questionnaire on all for-hire carriers not subject to the Interstate Commerce Act. These questionnaires to be returned to the State commissions for their information if desired and forwarding to Washington for tabulation.

The panel, however, has no way of knowing whether:

(a) The State commissions have adequate up-to-date usable records, of the kind necessary for such procedure;

(b) The State commissions are so staffed as to make this work a reasonable request;

(c) Whether under their existing legal authority the State commissions could undertake to do this; and

(d) Whether such State commissions would care to be placed in a position to have to require such reports.

Because of the above and other reasons involving actual experience in working with State records, the panel entertains serious doubt that the plan is practical. Nor is it believed that it would provide the essential data as readily and as economically as would the recommended census.

Moreover, there would still be entirely uncovered statistically the exempt interstate carriers.

In the event that the Interstate Commerce Commission feels it cannot arrange to make a substantially complete coverage of the carriers subject to its jurisdiction, the panel recommends that this be done by the Bureau of the Census in connection with the recommended quinquennial census of intrastate and exempt carriers and coinciding with the date of taking the censuses of manufactures, mines, and business.

It is well known that at present any interested party can find in available Government reports data as to the number, size, employees, and wages, etc., of manufacturing, wholesale, retail, and service establishments by kind for practically any county or city in which such person is interested. No such data are available on for-hire motor carriers, even the class I carriers now reporting to the ICC.

It is the opinion of the panel that only such comprehensive reports as are here in mind, developed on a uniform basis, will fill the needs of the Congress, the various Federal agencies, and the general public for up-to-date adequate information on for-hire transportation by motor.

STATUS OF FEDERAL STATISTICS ON PRIVATE CARRIERS BY MOTOR

I. Classes and number of private carriers by motor

The term "private carrier," as was noted in the introductory statement, is used as a general term of convenience in referring to those persons, individuals, firms, et al., who furnish part or all of their own motor transport of property or persons in connection with the operation of their industry or business.

Thus the so-called private carriers of property may include:

Manufacturers—the census reported 185,732 establishments in 1939.

Retailers—1,770,355 according to 1940 census.

Wholesalers—200,573 according to 1940 census.

Service establishments—646,024 according to 1940 census.

Farmers—6,096,799 in 1940, of which 944,184 or 15.5 percent reported on trucks.

Included, too, would be railroads, waterway companies, truck lines, warehouses, etc., to the extent that they own and use trucks incident to the conducting of their businesses but not for hire.

There are no recurring reports made to any Federal agency showing even the total number of individuals, businesses, industries, etc., which own and operate motor vehicles in connection with their business operations.

II. Extent of present statistical coverage

With the exception of data developed by certain special marketing and transportation studies by various agencies incident to their own work or in cooperation with the various States and State institutions practically no Federal statistics are available on private carriers.

The census of agriculture does include the number of automobiles and the number of trucks on farms but develops no data as to the extent or kind of their use. Also in the past, the census of manufacturers has obtained delivery equipment data from some few kinds of manufacturing. Such inquiries have apparently been discontinued in most instances.

It is, of course, known in general that in some kinds of businesses truck ownership and use have grown markedly. This is shown by the increase in truck registrations as reported to Public Roads Administration by the States. However, because of differences in State registration deadline dates, duplication of registration as between States and other variations in registering and reporting, it is extremely difficult to arrive at a reliable figure even as to the total number of trucks in operation as of a given date.

Further, the registration data as published, do not differentiate as between those vehicles used for hire and those used in the private operation of business.

III. Adequacy of present statistics and need for additional data

No extended comment is needed here in view of the situation as described above.

The need for such data seems to be universally accepted and is actively evidenced on the part of numerous Federal agencies, as well as by nongovernmental organizations and individuals.

IV. Kinds of data needed

These may be summarized as being those data which will enable development of the facts concerning motor-vehicle ownership and use by kinds of business, by geographical location, and in relation to for-hire motor transportation and other modes of transportation. It is desired to measure the amount and extent of such private transport in comparison to for-hire transportation by various other means and the relative extent to which industry and business use private carriage and for-hire carriage.

V. Recommended procedures

Since private carriers of property by motor are manufacturers, mineral industries, assemblers, and wholesalers, retailers, construction-service businesses, and farmers, each of which is periodically covered by a census, it seems quite obvious that the most feasible and economical method for the Government to use in providing the needed statistics thereon is through the incorporation in the regular census schedules of appropriate motor-transport inquiries.

While it is true that certain other Federal agencies under existing authority could proceed to obtain coverage of all or parts of this phase of motor transport, the panel believes that this should be undertaken by the census.

Among the reasons which might be cited are:

(a) It would undoubtedly be more economical than for such other agencies to supply and train a separate force of enumerators or interviewers.

(b) It would obviate the necessity of businesses, industries, etc., having to report to two different Federal agencies at about the same time and such reporting would necessarily involve duplication of certain inquiries.

(c) It would provide opportunity to obtain at the same time the information as to the use of the other forms of transportation.

(d) It would be more apt to result in uniformity of and hence increased usefulness of reports.

The panel deemed it unnecessary at this time to work out the details of the inquiries which it believes should be incorporated in the schedules used with each of the other censuses.

The panel does recommend, however, that provision should be made to secure essentially the following data:

1. Inventory of equipment by kind, type, and age, including passenger cars used in the business.

2. The extent to which raw materials, supplies, etc., are received by motor, both owned and for hire, with comparative data on other modes of transport.

3. Comparable data on shipment or delivery of products or merchandise with suitable variations to care for differences in the kind and conduct of operations of industry, business, etc.

For the most part the panel accepts the recommendations made on this matter by the transportation subcommittee approximately 1 year ago. However, the panel feels that the inquiries at that time proposed for addition to the census of manufactures schedules were probably developed too much in detail.

Specifically the panel does recommend that such inquiries as are calculated to produce the needed data be incorporated in the census of manufactures now authorized for 1948, covering the year 1947, in the event that Congress makes appropriation for the conduct thereof. Further, if additional censuses of business, mineral, industries, etc., be authorized and appropriated for, the panel recommends that the schedules used thereon should also contain such transportation inquiries.

It is further recommended that at the time of the taking of the next farm and ranch census, now authorized for 1950, suitable provision should be made to secure adequate transportation statistics in connection with that census.

The panel recommends that a program for providing adequate Federal statistical coverage of motor-carrier transport along the above lines be expedited as much as possible.

The panel realizes that implementation of the work on the part of some of the agencies mentioned might be contingent on the matter of additional appropriations.

Unanimously adopted by the panel:

Panel on Highway Transport Statistics of Subcommittee on Transportation of the Federal Committee on Economic Statistics: John C. Winter, Department of Agriculture; Kenneth Myers, Department of Agriculture, alternate; Knute E. Carlson, Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce; W. H. S. Stevens, Interstate Commerce Commission; C. W. Emken, Interstate Commerce Commission, alternate; Charles D. Bohannan, Public Roads Administration, chairman.

FEBRUARY 14, 1947.

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, in conclusion, I have been advised that the Committee on the Civil Service, to which the bill (S. 6) has been referred, proposes to consider the measure at an early date. I sincerely hope this is so. I feel confident that public hearings on the bill will support fully the need for such legislation, and I earnestly hope that the bill may be brought before the Senate for action at an early date.

PETROLEUM AND NATURAL GAS RESERVES

Mr. MOORE obtained the floor.

Mr. LANGER and Mr. SMITH addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator yield, and if so, to whom?

Mr. MOORE. I am perfectly willing to yield, but since the Senator from Nevada [Mr. McCARRAN] raised the point of strict adherence to the rule, I think perhaps I should not yield.

Mr. LANGER. Will the Senator from Oklahoma yield to me?

Mr. MOORE. I yield to the Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. LANGER. I thank the Senator very much. When I am through I shall yield back the floor to the Senator from Oklahoma.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Oklahoma has the floor.

Mr. MOORE. I think I shall have to decline to yield if the Senator from North Dakota is going to make a speech. I do not claim to have the power to farm out the floor.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a short statement?

Mr. MOORE. No; I decline to yield.

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry. The Senator will yield for that, will he not?

Mr. MOORE. Yes; I shall be glad to yield.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Nevada will state his parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, when a Senator who wants to speak rises and addresses the Chair before other Senators do, does the present occupant of the chair rule that he should be recognized as against the list which is before the Presiding Officer? In that regard, let me say that it is the position and always has been the position of the Senate that lists before the Presiding Officer do not stand as against a Senator who is recognized and has the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair was about to say to the Senator from Nevada that the list is for the convenience of the Chair, as the Chair thinks the Senator from Nevada knows. In the opinion of the Chair the Senator is not in error when he raises the question in the parliamentary manner in which he just raised it.

Mr. McCARRAN. Very well, Mr. President.

Mr. MOORE. Mr. President, in view of the public concern as to this country's position with respect to petroleum reserves, I have from time to time in the past called the attention of Members of Congress to the estimates of domestic reserves made by the American Petroleum Institute. The recent report of the Special Committee To Investigate Petroleum Resources dealt at some length with the question of our domestic reserves, as compared with the petroleum reserves of other countries, and the interest of American nationals in reserves located in foreign countries.

On February 27, the American Petroleum Institute's committee on petroleum reserves issued its latest estimate concerning proved domestic petroleum reserves as of December 31, 1946. According to this latest estimate, we have in the United States proved petroleum reserves totaling 20,873,560,000 barrels. It is interesting to note that this figure is an increase of a billion barrels over the 19,941,846,000 barrels of estimated proved reserves as of December 31, 1945. During the year 1946 we produced a total of 1,726,340,000 barrels, which means that we have had an over-all increase of estimated proved reserves to the extent of over 2,600,000,000 barrels.

Approximately 2,400,000,000 barrels of the increase is attributable to the extension of known pools, and approximately 245,000,000 barrels represent new discoveries.

It is an interesting fact that the basis on which these estimates are made does not include reserves of oil under the unproved portions of partly developed fields, oil in untested prospects, oil that may be present in unknown prospects in regions believed to be generally favorable, oil that may become available by secondary recovery methods, oil that may become available through chemical processing of natural gas, or oil that can be made from oil shales, coal, or other synthetic sources.

According to the committee's report, these estimates are based upon actual development under producing methods being employed at the present time.

In addition to these estimated petroleum reserves, the committee also estimates, as of December 31, 1946, condensate reserves at 1,050,794,000 barrels and other natural gas liquid reserves at 2,270,233,000 barrels, making a total estimated domestic liquid hydrocarbon reserve of 24,194,587,000 barrels. Natural gas liquids include condensate, natural gasoline, and liquefied petroleum gases.

Proved natural gas reserves, as of December 31, 1946, are estimated at approximately 160,000,000,000,000 cubic feet, as compared with approximately 148,000,000,000,000 as of December 31, 1945, or an increase of about 8 percent for the year. The net production of natural gas for the year 1946, after deducting gas returned to underground reservoirs, is estimated at 4,900,000,000,000 cubic feet.

THE PALESTINE SITUATION

Mr. IVES. Mr. President, within the past few days, a matter has arisen which once again brings the Palestine problem to the fore. Following Britain's decision to submit the Palestine question to the United Nations, it is now proposed that a special United Nations' committee be created to study this question with a view toward reporting to the General Assembly in its second session in September recommendations for its settlement. The Secretary General of the United Nations has communicated this proposal to the British, American, Russian, French, and Chinese delegations.

It seems to me that the decision of the British Foreign Office to put the matter of Palestine before the United Nations Assembly offers little hope of a constructive solution.

In the first place, the Assembly does not meet until next September. In the second place, the Assembly is not itself a body which can independently evolve any acceptable solution of this extremely complicated and delicate problem. It is true that the Assembly might ratify and confirm a solution. But a popular body representing 55 nations and with a membership of several hundred, most of whom are unfamiliar and unconnected with the problem, cannot be expected itself to evolve a solution. Furthermore, it has no authority to impose a solution.

A brief analysis of the pertinent provisions of the United Nations' Charter will, I believe, make this abundantly clear.

The Charter provides two main avenues of approach to this problem. First, under article 14, the General Assembly "May recommend measures for the peaceful adjustment of any situation, regardless of its origin, which it deems likely to impair the general welfare of friendly relations among nations." Second, under article 77, the United Nations trusteeship system may be invoked with respect to territories now held under mandate.

One thing is sure: It is not yet clear whether the British propose to make a recommendation for "peaceful adjustment"—the first approach—or whether they propose in due course to proceed for "trusteeship"—the second line of approach.

A trusteeship—if this be proposed—can only be created by agreement between "the States directly concerned, including the mandatory power." It is known that the Arab states press the view that they are "states directly concerned" in Palestine and that there can be no trusteeship except on terms approved by them. Whether or not this is a correct interpretation of the Charter, it does in fact create immediately a serious obstacle to a satisfactory trusteeship arrangement. Furthermore, Britain as a mandatory power would have to propose concrete and specific terms of trusteeship. But Britain has made no trusteeship proposals as yet.

The reference of the Palestine problem to the Assembly without recommendation by the British Government has merely resulted in dumping this complex problem into the lap of the Assembly, presumably for the formulation of its own trusteeship agreement. At the last session of the General Assembly, eight separate trusteeship agreements were approved, but in each case the mandatory power made its own specific proposals, and these were concurred in by the overwhelming majority of the other member states, including "the states directly concerned."

Moreover, if the United Kingdom proposes to follow the first approach I have mentioned, that is, to have the General Assembly recommend a "peaceful adjustment" of the Palestine problem, just what is that proposal to be? It does not seem to me, upon close analysis, that the Assembly of the United Nations is the forum best calculated to achieve a just and acceptable result.

This week's proposal to create a Committee of Inquiry—to which I referred at the outset of my remarks—involves the setting up of a committee which, in order to achieve a just result, would have to be free from bias. The selection of such an impartial committee in and of itself creates a first major problem. Even assuming a competent committee free from bias is at all possible, it would then be faced with a fact-finding project of major proportions, with all of the resultant delays. Furthermore, if the creation of such a committee must await approval by the Assembly itself in September of this year—and there is ground for this view—then a committee report would not be available until the succeeding meeting of the Assembly, which would normally occur in October 1948.

While on the subject of the committee proposal, I think it well to point out that the Anglo-American Committee of Inquiry, upon which we had all rested so much hope, submitted on April 20, 1946, to the British and American Governments a report containing a series of recommendations on Palestine. But even this report seems now to have been relegated to the limbo of the forgotten, its recommendations entirely ignored.

It is my considered view, therefore, that the course now being pursued does not really contain the sound elements of an early or just solution.

Nor does it actually relieve the United Kingdom as the mandatory power of the responsibility of itself formulating either a proposed trusteeship or a proposed recommendation to the General Assembly. These are necessary preliminaries to effective action by the Assembly.

In the event the Palestine problem is to be embodied in a trusteeship agreement, no time should now be lost formulating its terms. The Assembly cannot be expected to act intelligently until not only the whole problem has been explored, but an approach to its solution has been furnished by the mandatory power. The Committee proposal now suggested will mean a further delay of perhaps 1 or 2 years.

I respectfully urge the President and the State Department to weigh carefully their decision with respect to the Committee proposal submitted to this Government by the Secretary General of the United Nations. The proposal is fraught with delay. There is need for more realistic thinking in the evaluation of methods which are to be employed in helping to bring about an early and just solution.

The Palestine problem is only a part of the larger problem involving displaced persons. A bill with regard to the immigration of certain displaced persons into this country, which I shall propose, should tend in some measure to alleviate the present distress in which so many thousands of young, innocent victims of the war now find themselves.

The entire problem of displaced persons will be measurably assisted by immediate substantial immigration of Jews into Palestine, as recommended by the Anglo-American Committee of Inquiry last year. This immigration, which Britain alone can make possible, cannot await a solution of the entire Palestine problem. Human life cannot languish so long.

This problem is a matter of concern for men of all faiths. Assistance to victims of persecution and tyranny is a major test of our war and peace aims. We must, in the name of common humanity, help to provide for these displaced people who seek refuge, a chance at life itself. By doing our part in meeting this problem we shall help to insure a better day to come for all mankind.

CONTINUATION OF CERTAIN WAR EXCISE TAX RATES—CONFERENCE REPORT

Mr. MILLIKIN. Mr. President, I present the conference report to accompany House bill 1630, called the Excise Tax Act of 1947.

The report was read, as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 1030) to continue in effect certain war excise tax rates, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference, have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

Amendment numbered 1: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 1, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed to be inserted by the Senate amendment insert the following:

"SEC. 7. (a) Section 2401 of the Internal Revenue Code (relating to the tax on furs) is hereby amended by inserting after the words 'chief value' a comma and the following: 'but only if such value is more than three times the value of the next most valuable component material'.

"(b) The amendment made by subsection (a) shall apply in the case of articles sold on or after the first day of the first month which begins more than twenty days after the date of the enactment of this Act."

And the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 2: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 2, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed to be inserted by the Senate amendment insert the following:

"SEC. 8. (a) Section 3469 (a) of the Internal Revenue Code (relating to the tax on transportation of persons) is hereby amended by inserting after the first sentence two new sentences to read as follows: 'The tax shall not apply with respect to transportation any part of which is outside the northern portion of the Western Hemisphere, except with respect to any part of such transportation which is from any port or station within the United States, Canada or Mexico to any other port or station within the United States, Canada or Mexico. For the purposes of this section, the words "northern portion of the Western Hemisphere" mean the area lying west of the thirtieth meridian west of Greenwich, east of the International Date Line, and north of the Equator, but not including any country of South America.'

"(b) The amendment made by subsection (a) shall apply to amounts paid on or after the first day of the first month which begins more than twenty days after the date of the enactment of this Act for transportation on or after such first day.

"(c) Effective with respect to tickets sold or issued on or after the first day of the first month which begins more than twenty days after the date of the enactment of this Act, section 1806 of the Internal Revenue Code (relating to stamp tax on passage tickets) is hereby repealed."

And the Senate agree to the same.

Managers on the Part of the House.

Mr. MILLIKIN. Mr. President, Senators may remember that the Senate added two amendments to the bill as it came from the House. The House conferees and the House have accepted the Senate amendments, with amendments. The conference report was unanimously adopted by the conferees. The two amendments concerned excise taxes on furs and taxes on travel.

The fur amendment was accepted in exact substance as it left the Senate, with only clerical changes. The travel amendment was changed to the extent that the tax remains on transportation from this country to certain delimited areas including Canada, Mexico, Central America, and certain of the off-shore islands, on the theory that if we took the tax off as to those places we would be giving unfair competition to the resort areas of our own country.

Mr. WILEY. If I understood the Senator's remarks correctly, he said the Senate amendment regarding furs was agreed to substantially in its entirety.

Mr. MILLIKIN. In substance. There was some change in clerical verbiage.

Mr. WILEY. I thank the Senator.

Mr. MILLIKIN. I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the conference report.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the report was considered and agreed to.

PERSONAL STATEMENT

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, some weeks ago when, as chairman of the Senate Committee on Civil Service, I announced that the postal rates on the large magazines, publications, and the large newspapers would have to be raised in order to meet the $300,000,000 deficit in the Postal Department, I was warned that if I persisted bitter attacks, no matter how unfounded, would be made against my personal character. Conceiving it to be our duty, the entire membership of the Senate Civil Service Committee, including myself, has proceeded with the investigation and have demanded that the Post Office Department recommend rates sufficient to wipe out the deficit as nearly as possible. On Tuesday that recommendation was filed with us, and we announced hearings for March 18; and I am here to assure the Senate that those hearings will be held, regardless of any pressure of any kind or character.

Certainly there can be no justification for a large publication making profits running into the millions of dollars being mailed out at the expense of the taxpayer. The Post Office is operated by the Government as a business enterprise, and it should be run on a business basis; and a newspaper or magazine making large profits should welcome the opportunity to pay enough postage to cover the actual mailing, rather than making money at the expense of the rank and file of the taxpayers.

This morning the Times-Herald, published here in Washington, led off with the attack against my personal character that I had been told would come. This newspaper stated:

The U. S. S. Marine Adder will steam out of the Golden Gate with 256 very unwilling Indonesian ex-seamen aboard—but most significant of all, 10 additional Indonesians will be exempt and remain in this country, because they are the friends of a friend of a United States Senator—Senator WILLIAM LANGER, Republican, of North Dakota.

The case itself calls attention to a host of recent developments in Congress regarding immigration, and may well set off the next real roundhouse battle on Capitol Hill over postwar immigration policies.

LANGER's connection with it throws a hard, cold light on a startling practice which other Congressmen have been indulging in for years to protect their special friends from the long arm of their own laws.

Briefly, this is what happened in the Javanese case. During the war several hundred Indonesian seamen jumped ship or were stranded in this country. Because of their racial background they were not eligible to become citizens.

After much detective work the tough, quick-drawing agents of the Immigration and Naturalization Service rounded up 256 and chartered a boat to deport them to Batavia on June 13, 1946.

A few days before the scheduled sailing the Indonesians' lawyers applied for a writ of habeas corpus in the Federal district court at San Francisco. They claimed they were supporters of the Indonesian republican government which was fighting the Dutch at that time, and would be slapped into prison immediately in Batavia as political criminals.

The writ was denied; the Ninth Circuit Court of Appeals affirmed the decision, and the United States Supreme Court refused to review it. But in the meantime the boat sailed without the Indonesians. The Immigration Service held them in its big detention center at Crystal City, Tex., until today's shipment could be arranged.

Incidentally, the quarrel between the Dutch and rebel Indonesian Government has been settled now, and the Dutch authorities in Batavia have promised not to molest any of the deportees.

Here's where LANGER came in. On February 14, 1947, he introduced a private bill into the Senate to waive the immigration laws in the case of 10 Indonesians in New York City and let them become permanent residents of the United States "on payment of visa fee of $10 and head taxes of $8 a person."

Immediately, the Department of Justice stopped all deportation proceedings against the 10, pending action by Congress on the bill. This is a long-established courtesy given Senators and Representatives by the Attorney General.

The wheels of justice stand still, as long as the bill is in the hopper, whether it passes or not. Presumably, LANGER can introduce a similar bill every session, and delay the Indonesians' deportation indefinitely.

This maneuver, of course, has been open to all Senators and Representatives for many years. Only last week, the House Judiciary Committee took steps to tighten up the rules, and Chairman Representative EARL C. MICHENER (Republican), of Michigan, ran smack into a storm of angry protests.

In the Seventy-eighth Congress, 117 such antideportation bills were introduced. In the Seventy-ninth Congress, 443 were introduced, with only 13 becoming laws. So far in this Congress, the Eightieth, which is just 2 months' old, 353 have been tossed into the hopper, with a grand total of over 1,000 predicted.

Nobody really expects many of these bills to become laws, but they furnish protection to all the persons named, for the next 2 years.

To knock this off, and save the Government "a great deal of embarrassment and expense," MICHENER wrote Attorney General Tom C. Clark last week that the Justice Department "may feel free to disregard the practice of staying deportation proceedings," unless the full Judiciary Committee request such action. The Department averages 1,500 deportation cases a month. Another 15,000 persons are caught every month close to the borders, and taken back bodily by the immigration patrol.

The Senate Judiciary Committee, which now has 75 such bills, did not follow the House group's example, however. So, presumably Clark must continue to hold up deportation of every person named in a Senator's bill—including LANGER's Javanese. It is known that immigration agents took the 10 off the passenger list for the Marine Adder.

In addition to the Indonesians, LANGER also has a bill in the hopper to give permanent residence to eight British Indians.

Why is a North Dakota Senator so interested in Javanese and Indians (Hindu, that is, not Sioux), all of whom live in New York City? This question admittedly baffles his colleagues. An office assistant merely explains that the Indians were "friends of a friend" of the Senator, and the Indonesians were "just a similar case."

Other observers speculate that another explanation must lie somewhere in LANGER'S amazing career.

He was elected Governor of North Dakota in 1933, removed from the office by the State supreme court in 1934, reelected Governor in 1937; elected Senator in 1940, and allowed to serve after a bitter floor fight.

Mr. President, I have always been one of those men in public life who believe that the actions of a public official should be above reproach and open at all times to the fullest investigation. Also, I feel that this is one body left in the whole world where a Member under oath can truly express himself and be responsible only to his conscience and to Almighty God. Upon several occasions, I have voted alone against a confirmation or proposed measure. For example, I voted alone against the appointment of the millionaire Stettinius as Secretary of State, not because he was a millionaire but because I considered him entirely unfit for the position, and events justified my opinion. Alone I voted against the extension of lend-lease, and I believe events have justified that vote, also.

I know from my association with the Members of this body, made up as it is of two men coming from every State in the Union, that there naturally is a divergence of views; and never once have I questioned the honesty or the motives of any Senator who has introduced a bill or cast his vote, and I have been most happy in the knowledge that until today my motives likewise have not been questioned. But being questioned as they are by this unbelievably insidious attack of slander and innuendo, I propose to meet it head-on. Therefore, I wish to repeat the last four paragraphs of this newspaper article:

The Senate Judiciary Committee, which now has 75 such bills, did not follow the House group's example, however. So, presumably, Clark must continue to hold up deportation of every person named in a Senator's bill—including LANGER's Javanese. It is known that immigration agents took the 10 off the passenger list for the Marine Adder.

In addition to the Indonesians, LANGER also has a bill in the hopper to give permanent residence to eight British Indians.

Why is a North Dakota Senator so interested in Javanese and Indians (Hindu, that is, not Sioux), all of whom live in New York City? This question admittedly baffles his colleagues. An office assistant explains merely that the Indians were "friends of a friend" of the Senator, and the Indonesians were "just a similar case."

Other observers speculate that another explanation must lie somewhere in LANGER's amazing career.

He was elected Governor of North Dakota in 1933, removed from the office by the State supreme court in 1934, reelected governor in 1937; elected Senator in 1940; and allowed to serve after a bitter floor fight.

Mr. President, a reading of the Congressional Directory will disclose that I state therein that I was sent to the United States Senate by the Republicans of North Dakota with the endorsement of the Non-Partisan League. The Non-Partisan League is a forerunner of what a real United Nations Organization should be and is not. I owe my election, not to any political clique or to the support of any powerful special interests in North Dakota, but I was elected by the rank and file of the people, regardless of race, color, sex, or creed. Supporting me almost unanimously were the physically handicapped, particularly the blind. Supporting me were the aged, receiving old-age assistance, who remembered my work in their behalf as governor and who were familiar with my attempts to assist them here. Supporting me were thousands upon thousands of farmer tenants and small farmers, who remembered the moratorium which I declared that saved their homes. Supporting me also were thousands of North Dakota citizens who gladly support any Senator whom they believe to be honest and fighting for what he believes is right.

It was with that kind of support from people who have so loyally voted for me for over 30 years that I came to the Senate, and it is for those men and women all over America that I shall ceaselessly work. Their ideals are my ideals. Their hopes and expectations are my hopes and expectations. Their wants and hunger and suffering and privations are my wants and hunger and suffering and privations. Let me say to the large publishers, to all of those who live without working, to those who live upon the tears and sacrifices and blood of their fellow human beings, that WILLIAM LANGER is not their man; and that during the last 6 years I have voted for and will continue to vote for as long as I am upon this floor, the underprivileged, the physically handicapped, the man unjustly accused of crime, the man in jail because of prejudice, the man who is not getting an honest deal.

It was in line with this duty that approximately 3 years ago I introduced a bill providing that some 3,000 people from East India who had come to this country before 1924 should, by complying with the naturalization laws, have a chance to become naturalized citizens. I believe the decision of the United States Supreme Court written by Judge Sutherland, that these 3,000 people are neither negroid or Caucasian is fundamentally wrong and that overwhelming evidence shows that these Indians are of the Caucasian race. At the subcommittee hearing last year before the Senate Committee on Immigration, the Department of Labor officials of the Immigration Department, members of the India Welfare League, ministers of both the Catholic and the Protestant faiths, leaders of labor organizations all testified that the bill should be passed. And no one, during the weeks that that bill was before the committee, spoke in opposition to it. Over in the House, Clare Boothe Luce and EMANUEL CELLER led the fight for these Indian people. The net result of it all was that my bill did not pass, but a quota of a hundred a year was established. This year I promptly reintroduced my bill, and it is pending today, and I am doing everything I can to see that it is passed.

These 3,000 Indians in 5 States of this Union cannot own land; the land they had was taken away from them, after they had slaved on it for from 20 to 25 years; they cannot secure licenses to drive their automobiles; nor can they exercise the benefits of free human beings, although many of them have resided here for over 30 years. I voted for and supported the bill providing for a quota of 107 Chinese, and I have consistently supported all legislation to wipe out any discrimination because of a person's race, color, sex, or creed.

During the war, as Senators all know, I led the fight for those people from South American countries, hundreds of whom were interned at Bismarck, N. Dak., and Crystal City, Tex., and insisted on securing the ultimate release of most of them.

Coming now to the last four paragraphs of the article which I quoted, this newspaper wonders why a North Dakota Senator would be interested in Javanese and Indians, all of whom lived in New York City. If this newspaper had sent their reporter to me, he would have found that I did so because, for a long while, I have been working with a nonpartisan defense agency of the labor movement, known as the Workers Defense League, with national headquarters at 112 East Nineteenth Street, New York City, which is headed by Rev. Aron S. Gilmartin, national chairman, and Rev. Donald Harrington, chairman of the action committee. If any Senator wants to get in touch with the Workers Defense League, their New York telephone number is Algonquin 4-4953. This nonpartisan organization is one that fights for poor people everywhere, regardless of race or color, sex or creed. It was at their request that I introduced the bill for the 10 Indonesians. I have upon my desk the letter which was sent to me by the Workers Defense League. There are only about 1,000 Indonesians in the whole United States. They are uniformly poor people, laboring men and women without money, without influence, without much hope, and in my opinion, with a knowledge that, in spite of all the assurance they have been given by Great Britain, when they are deported, many of them will face certain death.

What is the background of some of these Indonesians who are being deported? Let us consider the case of Philip Sumampow. According to Rowland Watts, the associate secretary of the Workers Defense League, this Indonesian has been in this country for 18 years, during most of which time he has been employed at the General Analine Co., Elizabeth, N. J., and held a responsible position as foreman at the time of his detention last week. He is married to an American, has five American children, ranging in age from 15 years to 18 months, and his wife is now pregnant. I ask, Why should this family be broken up? This man, who has been convicted of no crime, but who has an honest record as a hard-working, laboring man who gave all he could in the war effort—why should this man be sent thousands of miles away from his family by the Immigration Department? But a man like Charlie Chaplin, with his communistic leanings, with his unsavory record of lawbreaking, of rape, or the betrayal of American girls 16 and 17 years of age, remains. Is it, I ask, because the one man is poor and the other man almost unbelievably rich? Philip Sumampow, symbol of fine, hard-working men and women who have made America what it is today, is deported; Chaplin, the debaucher of girls, the symbol of everything that the average American young boy should not aspire to, stays. I introduced a bill last year to have Chaplin deported and gotten out of the United States, whose hospitality he has for many years abused; but the Immigration Department wrote me that there was nothing doing. Chaplin, who, upon the witness stand under oath, has admitted everything with which I am charging him here. Chaplin is one of the darlings of the Communist Party; and, significantly enough, none of the large magazines or newspapers supported me in the fight to get him out of the country.

Today I am introducing a bill in behalf of Petros Katsros, a Greek boy who, at 14 years of age, entered the Greek Army, fighting against Hitler, for the freedom of his country. This boy, who was captured and for 4 years kept in a concentration camp, and who as a stowaway landed at Detroit and was found upon the ship, is to be deported on Monday. I do not know this lad. I do not know any of his relatives. But I do know that America would be a better country if he were allowed to remain here. So long as we have a provision in our laws which permits certain foreign boys to come over here and become students, I have notified the Immigration Department that I shall leave nothing undone that human ingenuity can devise, nothing that I can think of that can honestly be done, to get the immigration authorities to permit this young boy to enter one of the schools of the United States so that in years to come this brave lad may return to Europe, well educated, to preach the value to the common people of a true democracy. This boy, with his record for bravery, heroism, and initiative, certainly is as much entitled to become a student here as is the son of some European milionaire potentate.

Mr. President, so far as the last paragraph of this unwarranted newspaper article is concerned, it will be sufficient for me to say that during my public career in North Dakota I have been arrested and sued before juries 16 times; that in every instance I have demanded a jury trial and in every instance except one the jury decided in my favor. In that one instance the circuit court of appeals in Kansas City promptly reversed the decision as a frame-up entered into by a crooked Federal judge and a group of enemies headed by the private power companies and big-wig politicians. It is true that that jury convicted me on the 17th day of June, 1934; but it is also true that 10 days later I was renominated for governor by one of the biggest votes ever cast in a primary election by the people of my State. It is also true that this crooked Federal judge was able to prevent my getting my appeal to the circuit court of appeals in time for the fall election by holding up the printing of the record; but it is also true that in the next general election the people of my State reelected me governor, although I ran neither as a Democrat nor as a Republican, but as an independent with the support of the Nonpartisan League. Mr. Landon headed the Republican ticket and Mr. Roosevelt the Democratic ticket. My name went off one side of the ballot.

It is also true that when I entered the Senate it took me 15 months to be permanently seated; but it is further true that I was seated by a vote of 52 to 30 in this body; and that in the election last November, with the big, fat crowd aided by money from Minneapolis and New York unable to defeat me, although they sent out speeches delivered by Senators on the floor of the Senate in opposition to me, and sent out every word of testimony that was given here, the people of North Dakota voted for me, with the result that I carried every one of the 53 counties in the State of North Dakota. Those people know me as they have known my grandfather and my father before me. They are familiar with the fight of the Langer family over a period of time that commenced long before North Dakota was a State, and while it was still a Territory. They know that I can be trusted on the floor of the Senate.

So far as my personal honesty is concerned, I have today written a letter to President Truman asking that he make my income-tax returns during all the time that I have been in the Senate available to the Times-Herald or to any agent of the Times-Herald; and I challenge any or all of them to examine them and to do their worst. During the time that I have been a Member of the Senate I have never represented special interests. I have never directly or indirectly received one penny for introducing a bill of any kind or character or for making any speech upon this floor. I have fought and will continue to fight for the people of North Dakota and for the people of this country. I will continue to be the champion of the poor and the oppressed everywhere all over this world. I fundamentally believe that people of any country, no matter how small, should have a right to govern themselves, and that any man or woman, no matter how humble, no matter whether he be an alien refugee, a stowaway, or a citizen, should have the right to go to the office of any representative of the people and obtain a hearing.

Mr. President, of the 2,000,000,000 people on this earth, we have only 140,000,000 in the United States. The time will come when America will need the friendship of the brown and the yellow races. Here in our own country the American Indian is not yet free. After 175 years he is still cooped up on reservations. Around the council table of the United Nations sit representatives of countries against whom we are discriminating. It is this discrimination which is being played up by Communists all over the world. It is this discrimination that organizations such as the United Action for Freeing Indonesians, a Communist-inspired organization, no longer protest because the communistic forces in Indonesia are capitalizing on the development of Indian-American disagreement.

In conclusion I ask the Senate what has become of paragraph 3 of article I of the Charter of the United Nations, which states that one purpose of the United Nations is "to achieve international cooperation in solving international problems of an economic, social, cultural, or humanitarian character, and in promoting and encouraging respect for human rights and for fundamental freedoms for all without distinction as to race, sex, language, or religion."

So, Mr. President, I do not condemn the man who wrote this article for the Times-Herald or men like him. I do not call them names. I do not say anything mean or vicious about them or about Sissy Patterson, the publisher of the Times-Herald, because for 30 years I have had the opposition of the millionaire press of the country. But I want them to know that when I say my prayers tonight I shall ask Almighty God that these men and women may, through the grace of God, have understanding, wisdom, and faith in humanity; that they may have the strength and the courage to battle for the rights of the weak and the oppressed; and that, above all, they may learn to realize that the 96 men who compose the Senate, with all their individual faults and weaknesses, constitute one of the bulwarks of this Nation, and that by unjustly attacking any Member of this body they are only weakening the confidence among the people of this country that I believe the Senate so justly merits.

THE LEGISLATIVE BUDGET—PERSONAL STATEMENT

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, unfortunately it was not possible for me to be present in the Senate during the debate on the budget question, although I did return in time for the final vote last Monday. I should like, therefore, to make a brief statement of my position for the RECORD.

I supported the $4,500,000,000 deduction rather than the $6,000,000,000 deduction, and I also approved the Knowland amendment providing that—

> It is the judgment of the Congress that sound fiscal policy requires that not less than $2,600,000,000 of the excess of revenues over expenditures be applied toward reduction of the public debt during the fiscal year 1948.

The final vote, in which I participated, was in line with a statement which I released to the press on February 18, when I was confined to my home because of illness. In that statement I endeavored to analyze the budget issue and to present the problems involved. For the purpose of the RECORD, I now read the statement which I released on February 18:

> The budget issue presents four problems of immediate and pressing importance:
> 1. Balancing of the budget.
> 2. Maintenance of the necessary strength of our Military Establishment.
> 3. Debt retirement.
> 4. Tax cuts.
> I have listed these items in what I believe is the proper order of their importance.
> We must balance the budget. There can be no defense of deficit financing in peacetime, and especially when our national income is at an all-time high.
> We must maintain the necessary strength of our Military Establishment at this moment of international uncertainties. Secretary Marshall must have the all-out support of the Nation in his coming conferences. Ambassador Austin must have our all-out support as our representative to the United Nations and as the United States member of the Security Council. And this includes the vitally necessary food program in the occupied countries. We must furnish enough food for a minimum ration or we will be compelled to furnish more soldiers to maintain order. Whether the military and naval budgets can be cut is a proper matter of inquiry, but an arbitrary slash of nearly $2,000,000,000 without adequate hearings, seems to me difficult to defend.
> We must make ourselves debt-conscious by a determination to reduce the national debt immediately and annually. As a famous statesman said in years gone by: "The way to resume (specie payments) is to resume"—so today we must face the issue squarely—the way to reduce the debt is to reduce it. This means that there can be no more deficit financing and there must be debt reduction each year and every year beginning at once.
> We all favor tax reduction, and we can have tax reduction. We can prune the budget of nonessential items. We can reduce the overburdensome overhead. We can cut out the reckless cost of an unjustifiable Federal paternalism. We can sincerely allocate the sources of tax revenue between the Federal and State governments—and thus pass back to the States the responsibility for their share of social welfare. We can establish a program of Federal-State cooperation which will be effective in cutting the cost of Federal bureaucracy.
> But let me emphasize that the tax-cutting program must follow and not precede budget balancing, armed services needs including relief, and reasonable debt retirement.

Mr. President, as important as I feel tax reduction to be, especially as it undoubtedly will have a bearing on the stimulation of industry, with consequent expanded employment, I feel that our first responsibility is the critical world situation, including not only the adequate provision for our armed forces but especially the need for relief in the desperate areas of the world, and the assumption of such responsibilities as we may be called upon to assume in light of the British crisis and the serious situation in Greece. At the moment we do not have enough facts to determine what our financial commitments will be, but I feel we must recognize our international responsibilities in these matters.

Let me add just a word as to my conviction with regard to the world picture. The United States must face the clear-cut issue of accepting its responsibility for leadership in world affairs. The alternative would be to let the world drift into civil wars and inevitable chaos.

Such a situation would threaten the appearance somewhere of the inevitable "man on horseback," with terrible results similar to those we saw when Hitler emerged in Germany. We must help the world return to the maximum measure of sanity, and we must help make it self-sustaining. In saying this, I do not advocate the giving of blank checks. We are not in a position to support the whole world, nor would it be proper for us to do so. I do, however, strongly support Mr. Hoover's recommendations with regard to food relief in the desperate areas of the world, and especially in our zone in Germany. I believe that we should endorse the set-up for the International Refugee Organization under the United Nations, and that we should do all we can to solve the distressing problem of the displaced persons.

Let me emphasize that, although I recognize these obligations, I do not think the motive should be to enter the vacuum ourselves merely to prevent Russia from doing so. I am opposed to our getting into a position of antagonism to Russia. We must make Russia a more active participant in the work of the United Nations in rebuilding the world. We cannot think in terms of two spheres of influence. We cannot think in terms of a balancing of power between the Russian group of satellite countries and the United States, leading the western nations. We must give all that we can to building the conception of one world led by the United Nations organization, and our part obviously must be one of positive, aggressive, courageous leadership in bringing the United Nations to see their responsibilities in this critical situation.

THE PRESIDENTIAL TERM

The Senate resumed the consideration of the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 27), providing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States relating to the terms of office of the President.

Mr. O'DANIEL. Mr. President, for many years I have been sponsoring a proposal to limit the tenure of office of the President of the United States. I am glad the subject has finally reached the floor of the Senate for debate.

A proposed amendment to the Constitution limiting to 6 years the tenure of office of the President and Vice President of the United States and the Members of Congress, and imposing limitations on the appointment or election of certain persons to office has been before this body for some time.

My resolution was first introduced on October 14, 1943, in the first session of the Seventy-eighth Congress, and was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary. At that time the resolution was known as Senate Joint Resolution 86. No action was taken on it.

I reintroduced this joint resolution on January 22, 1945, in the first session of the Seventy-ninth Congress; and it was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary. In the Seventy-ninth Congress it was known as Senate Joint Resolution 21. No action was taken on it.

I again reintroduced the resolution on January 8, 1947, in the first session of the Eightieth Congress, and it was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary. In the Eightieth Congress the resolution is known as Senate Joint Resolution 18.

I now offer my resolution, Senate Joint Resolution 18, as a substitute for the joint resolution which is pending.

Mr. President, my resolution, which I am offering as a substitute for the pending resolution, goes further than the pending resolution, by including in addition to the office of President, the office of Vice President and all Members of both branches of the Congress. My resolution would limit to 6 years the tenure of all elective offices in our Federal Government. It would also prevent appointment of Members of the Senate or the House of Representatives to any civil office for 5 years after the termination of their elective job.

For the information of the Senate, Mr. President, I now read my resolution:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled (two-thirds of each House concurring therein), That the following article is proposed as an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, which shall be valid to all intents and purposes as part of the Constitution when ratified by the legislatures of three-fourths of the several States:

"ARTICLE —

"SECTION 1. The term of office of each President of the United States and of each Vice President of the United States elected after the date of this article takes effect shall be 6 years; and no person who shall have served as President or Vice President shall be eligible for election to the office of President or the office of Vice President.

"SEC. 2. No person shall be eligible for election or appointment to the office of Senator or Representative in Congress for any term which, if served by such person, would cause the aggregate service of such person as a Member of either or both the Senate and the House of Representatives to exceed 6 years.

"SEC. 3. Nothing contained in section 1 or section 2 of this article shall be construed to prevent any person who may hold the office of President, Vice President, Senator, or Representative in Congress, during the term within which this article is ratified from holding such office for the remainder of such term.

"SEC. 4. No person shall be appointed to any civil office under the authority of the United States who holds, or who shall have held within 5 years next preceding the date of such appointment, the office of Senator or Representative in Congress or of judge of any court under the authority of the United States, but nothing contained in this section shall be construed to prevent the appointment or assignment of a person who holds the office of judge of a court under the authority of the United States, to the office of judge of any other court under the authority of the United States.

"SEC. 5. This article shall be inoperative unless it shall have been ratified as an amendment to the Constitution by the legislatures of three-fourths of the several States within 7 years from the date of its submission to the States by the Congress."

Mr. President, I have prepared an article on this subject, and it gives quotations from former public officials and others. I ask unanimous consent that the article may be printed in the RECORD as a part of my remarks.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

The theory embodied in Senate Joint Resolution 18 is not new. When the Constitutional Convention was in session Randolph offered a number of resolutions, the fourth of which follows:

"Resolved, That the Members of the first branch of the National Legislature ought to be elected by the people of the several States every —— for the term of ——; to be of the age of —— years at least; to receive liberal stipends by which they may be compensated for the devotion of their time to the public service; to be ineligible to any office established by a particular State, or under the authority of the United States, except those peculiarly belonging to the functions of the first branch, during the term of service, and for the space of —— after its expiration; to be incapable of reelection for the space of —— after the expiration of their term of service, and to be subject to recall."

The fifth resolution reads:

"Resolved, That the Members of the second branch of the National Legislature ought to be elected by those of the first, out of a proper number of persons nominated by the individual legislatures, to be of the age of —— years at least; to hold their offices for a term sufficient to insure their independency; to receive liberal stipends, by which they may be compensated for the devotion of their time to the public service; and to be ineligible to any office established by a particular State, or under the authority of the United States, except those peculiarly belonging to the functions of the second branch during the term of service; and for the space of —— expiration thereof." (The Madison Papers, vol. 2, pp. 731–732, 1840.)

Still referring to the legislative branch of the Government, we find in the Records of the Federal Convention of 1787, edited by Max Farrand, volume 2, pages 285–287, the following summary of discussion on this question:

"Mr. Gerry read a resolution of the Legislature of Massachusetts passed before the act of Congress recommending the Convention, in which her deputies were instructed not to depart from the rotation established in the fifth article of Confederation, nor to agree in any case to give to the Members of Congress a capacity to hold office under the Government. This he said was repealed in consequence of the act of Congress with which the State thought it proper to comply in an unqualified manner. The sense of the State however was still the same. He could not think with Mr. Pinkney that the disqualification was degrading. Confidence is the road to tyranny. As to ministers and ambassadors, few of them were necessary. It is the opinion of a great many that they ought to be discontinued, on our part; that none may be sent among us, and that source of influence be shut up. If the Senate were to appoint ambassadors as seemed to be intended, they will multiply embassies for their own sakes. He was not so fond of those productions as to wish to establish nurseries for them. If they are once appointed, the House of Representatives will be obliged to provide salaries for them, whether they approve of the measures or not. If men will not serve in the Legislature without a prospect of such offices, our situation is deplorable indeed. If our best citizens are actuated by such mercenary views, we had better choose a single despot at once. It will be more easy to satisfy the rapacity of one than of many. According to the idea of one gentleman (Mr. Mercer) our Government it seems is to be a government of plunder. In that case it certainly would be prudent to have but one rather than many to be employed in it. We cannot be too circumspect in the formation of this system. It will be examined on all sides and with a very suspicious eye. The people who have been so lately in arms against Great Britain for their liberties will not easily give them up. He lamented the evils existing at present under our governments, but imputed them to the faults of those in office, not to the people. The misdeeds of the former will produce a critical attention to the opportunities afforded by the new system to like or greater abuses. As it now stands it is as complete an aristocracy as ever was framed. If great powers should be given to the Senate we shall be governed in reality by a Junto as has been apprehended. He remarked that it would be very differently constituted from Congress. (1) There will be but two deputies from each State, in Congress there may be seven and are generally five. (2) They are chosen for 6 years; those of Congress annually. (3) They are not subject to recall; those of Congress are. (4) In Congress, nine States are necessary for all great purposes—here eight persons will suffice. Is it to be presumed that the people will ever agree to such a system? He moved to render the Members of the House of Representatives as well as of the Senate ineligible not only during, but for 1 year after the expiration of their terms. If it should be thought that this will injure the Legislature by keeping out of it men of abilities who are willing to serve in other offices, it may be required as a qualification for other offices, that the candidate shall have served a certain time in the Legislature.

"Mr. Gouverneur Morris. * * * He was against rendering the members of the legislature ineligible to office. He was for rendering them eligible again after having vacated their seats by accepting office. Why should we not avail ourselves of their services if the people choose to give them their confidence. There can be little danger of corruption either among the people or the legislatures who are to be the electors. If they say we see their merits, we honor the men, we choose to renew our confidence in them, have they not a right to give them preference, and can they be properly abridged of it?"

There is one additional point which I would like to mention that was discussed in the Federal Convention, a brief quotation from records of the Federal Convention, by Farrand, volume 1, page 362, being sufficient for the purpose:

"Mr. Sherman preferred annual elections, but would be content with biennial. He thought the representatives ought to return home and mix with the people. By remaining at the seat of government they would acquire the habits of the place which might differ from those of their constituents."

It will be observed that in the days of the formation of the Republic the same questions were discussed that are involved in Senate Joint Resolution 18. The fears of the delegates to the Constitutional Convention of permitting members of the legislative branch of the Government to hold office in the executive branch appear to me to be just as real as in the days of the Constitutional Convention and are not lessened by the fact that now they wait until the expiration of their terms and, if they have rendered faithful service to the administration then in power, they are taken care of by appointment to some place in the executive branch of the Government where they can serve as long as they can be taken care of and then can become eligible for retirement, counting the years that they have served in Congress toward the number of years' service in the Government on which retirement pay is based.

On June 11, 1944, Gould Lincoln, in an article in the Evening Star of Washington, D. C., under the heading "Six-Year Limit Urged for Congress," wrote at some length on this subject, with particular reference to Congressman WAT ARNOLD's efforts along the same lines as Senate Joint Resolution 18. Quoting Mr. ARNOLD, Mr. Lincoln wrote:

"I favor a limitation of the terms of office of all elected representatives of the people of the United States of America, and such an attitude seems to border closely upon betrayal of the sacred trust of political office-holding."

Quoting further from Mr. ARNOLD, Mr. Lincoln said:

"No American should aspire to a career as a President, or as a Congressman. Industries, institutions, and ideas change too swiftly. Overlong exposure to the impersonal glare of the public spotlight focused upon Capitol Hill causes the sense of perspective which guides a public servant to diminish or even disappear entirely."

Again quoting Mr. ARNOLD, Mr. Lincoln says:

"A public officer, in my opinion, should be so restricted in his tenure of office that his efforts as a legislator would not have the opportunity to become completely unhinged from every day realities, as calculated from the standpoint of John Q. Public.

"His period of service to his country should be spent in compete freedom from the aggravating responsibility of continuously building toward reelection. A Congressman should serve his term of office and then return to his district to see if he could earn a decent moral living under the laws which he has been instrumental in enacting. No Congressman who cannot demonstrate his usefulness to his constituents in a practical enough way to justify his continuance in office for three terms should expect to be returned to Congress indefinitely. Such a down-to-earth approach to the problem should be a forever effective bar to the overloading of the statute books with legislation as ill-conceived as is its effect upon a red-tape-ensnarled citizenry.

* * * * *

"The exigencies of war make it imperative that the Congress remain in almost continuous session. Until the moment of victory comes, and well into the period of reconstruction following the conflict, it will be necessary to follow the same legislative schedule in the interest of the Nation's welfare.

"Naturally such a condition tends to expand tremendously the dangerous policy of increased centralization of government in Washington. The issue of States' rights may become irrevocably lost in the complex maze of bureaucracy and government by directive unless a substantial bulwark is established against further encroachment.

"To guarantee a regular infusion of new blood into the ranks of Congress would provide an excellent means of anticentralization control.

* * * * *

"The shores of the pond of Washington society are littered with an accumulation of humanity deposited there by reason of the presence of public servants in various stages of activity—mostly defunct."

When a man is elected to the Congress of the United States, I believe that he should be accountable to the voters who elected him and to no one else. That is not always the case, in my judgment, under present conditions. The power of Federal patronage can be invoked to reward those who follow the administration's policies and to punish those who vote against them. When a man for reasons which he considers to be valid and proper opposes the policy of the administration then in power it is always possible to refuse any request the man may make, no matter how worthy. If he goes along with the administration and secures his share of patronage he can "point with pride" to his success in forthcoming elections, and if he fails to do so his opponent can "view with alarm" his inability to obtain proper consideration for his State or district by the authorities as evidenced by his failure to obtain Federal projects and Federal appointments for citizens of his State or district who are primarily interested in legislation which they believe will be to the interest of their own particular group. Forming solid cohesive units many of them exercise substantial influence and political power.

There are in Washington various pressure groups, the stock argument of such groups being "vote as we say or we will defeat you in the next election." If a person knew in advance that he would not be a candidate in the next election this argument would fall flat. If a Member of Congress was barred from reelection I believe that there would be far less opportunity for pressure groups to influence legislation. In fact I believe most of the pressure groups will go out of business if Senate Joint Resolution 21 is adopted.

I firmly believe that it is to the best interest of the people of the United States to adopt this amendment and I also believe it is for the best interest of the Members of Congress themselves.

The office of Vice President is purely incidental to the office of President although he serves in the legislative branch as President of the Senate, unless by chance the man elected to that office should become the President of the United States.

For that reason I do not believe that there is any necessity to dwell on the necessity, or desirability, of a limited tenure for the Vice President. Anything that might be said about the office can be included in what I have to say in reference to the Presidency, and I therefore shall not advance any specific arguments concerning the Vice Presidency.

In reference to the executive branch of the Government it is only necessary to deal with the President because of the fact that all other officers and employees draw their authority from him and are responsible to him for their action. There is no question but what a strong Cabinet will, to a limited extent, be reflected in the political life of the country. In the final analysis the responsibility for and the authority under which they operate both rest with the President of the United States.

From the beginning of the Government various Presidents have discussed this subject. The first being George Washington, who in a letter to the Marquis de Lafayette on April 28, 1788, which appears in Ford Worthington Chauncey, the Writings of George Washington, which was collected and edited by New York and London, G. P. Putnam's Sons, 1891, the particular letter appearing in volume 11, pages 257-258:

"There are other points (in the proposed Constitution) in which opinions would be more likely to vary. As, for instance, on the ineligibility of the same person for President after he should have served a certain course of years. Guarded so effectually as the proposed Constitution is, in respect to the prevention of bribery and undue influence in the choice of President, I confess I differ widely myself from Mr. Jefferson and you as to the necessity of expediency of rotation in that appointment. The matter was fairly discussed in the Convention, and to my full conviction, though I cannot have time or room to sum up the argument in this letter. There cannot, in my judgment, be the least danger that the President will by any practicable intrigue ever be able to continue himself one moment in office, much less perpetuate himself in it, but in the last stage of corrupted morals and political depravity; and even then, there is as much danger that any other species of domination would prevail. Though when a people shall have become incapable of governing themselves, and fit for a master, it is of little consequence from what quarter he comes. Under an extended view of this part of the subject, I can see no propriety in precluding ourselves from the service of any man who on some great emergency shall be deemed universally most capable of serving the public."

President Washington evidently felt that the only danger in connection with this situation would come when the people were no longer able to govern themselves. However, placing a readily available species of domination in position to be exercised might conceivably accentuate that danger.

Thomas Jefferson was wholeheartedly in favor of the limitation in the Jeffersonian Encyclopedia, compiled by John P. Foley, printed by Funk & Wagnalls Co., New York, 1900, pages 865-867, the following occurs:

(a) Letter to John Taylor, January 1805:

"My opinion originally was that the President of the United States should have been elected for 7 years, and forever ineligible afterward. I have since become sensible that 7 years is too long to be irremovable, and that there should be a peaceable way of withdrawing a man in midway who is doing wrong. The service for 8 years, with a power to remove at the end of the first 4, comes nearly to my principle as corrected by experience; and it is in adherence to that that I determine to withdraw at the end of my second term. The danger is that the indulgence and attachments of the people will keep a man in the chair after he becomes a dotard, that reelection through life shall become habitual, and election for life follow that. General Washington set the example of voluntary retirement after 8 years. I shall follow it. And a few more precedents will oppose the obstacle of habit to anyone after a while who shall endeavor to extend his term. Perhaps it may beget a disposition to establish it by an amendment of the Constitution. I believe I am doing right, therefore, in pursuing my principle. I had determined to declare my intention, but I have consented to be silent on the opinion of friends, who think it best not to put a continuance out of my power in defiance of all circumstances. There is, however, but one circumstance which could engage my acquiescence in another election, to wit, such a division about a successor, as might bring in a monarchist. But that circumstance is impossible" (p. 865).

(b) Letter to Marquis de Lafayette, May 1807:

"I am panting for retirement, but am as yet nearly 2 years from that goal. The general solicitations I have received to continue another term give me great consolation, but considerations public as well as private determine me inflexibly on that measure" (p. 866).

(c) Letter to Mr. Weaver, June 1807:

"If some period be not fixed either by the Constitution or by practice, to the services of the first magistrate, his office, though nominally elective, will, in fact, be for life; and that will soon degenerate into an inheritance" (p. 865).

(d) Letter to Abner Watkins, December 1807:

"Believing that a definite period of retiring from this station will tend materially to secure our elective form of government and sensible, too, of that decline which advancing years bring on, I have felt it a duty to withdraw at the close of my present term of office; and to strengthen by practice a principle which I deem salutary" (p. 865).

(e) Reply to Vermont Legislature, December 1807:

"I received the address of the Legislature of Vermont, bearing date of the 5th of November 1806, in which with their approbation of the general course of my administration, they were so good as to express their desire that I would consent to be proposed again, to the public voice, on the expiration of my present term of office. Entertaining, as I do, for the Legislature of Vermont those sentiments of high respect which would have prompted an immediate answer, I was certain, nevertheless, they would approve a delay which had for its object so interesting as the election of the Chief Magistrate. That I should lay down my charge at a proper period, is as much a duty as to have borne it faithfully. If some termination to the services of the Chief Magistrate be not fixed by the Constitution, or supplied by practice, his office, nominally for years, will, in fact, become for life; and history shows how easily that degenerates into an inheritance. Believing that a representative government, responsible at short intervals of election, is that which produces the greatest sum of happiness to mankind, I feel it a duty to do no act which shall essentially impair that principle; and I should unwillingly be the person who, disregarding the sound precedent set by an illustrious predecessor, should furnish the first example of prolongation beyond the second term of office. Truth, also, requires me to add, that I am sensible of that decline which advancing years bring on; and feeling their physical, I ought not to doubt their mental effect. Happy if I am the first to perceive and to obey this admonition of nature, and to solicit a retreat from cares too great for the wearied faculties of age" (p. 867).

(f) Letter to James Sullivan, March 1808:

"I derive great personal consolation from the assurances in your friendly letter, that the electors of Massachusetts would still have viewed me with favor as a candidate for a third Presidential term. But the duty of retirement is so strongly impressed on my mind, that it is impossible for me to think of that" (p. 866).

(g) Reply to Taber Fitch, Esq., chairman, Connecticut Republicans, 1808:

"Having myself highly approved the example of an illustrious predecessor in voluntarily retiring from a trust, which, if too long continued in the same hands, might become a subject of reasonable uneasiness and apprehension, I could not mistake my own duty when placed in a similar situation" (pp. 865-866).

(h) Letter to Henry Guest, January 1809:

"I am sensible of the kindness of your rebuke on my determination to retire from office at a time when our country is laboring under difficulties truly great. But if the principle of rotation be a sound one, as I conscientiously believe it to be with respect to this office, no pretext should ever be permitted to dispense with it, because there never will be a time when real difficulties will not exist, and furnish a plausible pretext for dispensation. You suppose I am 'in the prime of life for rule.' I am sensible, I am not; and before I am so far declined as to become insensible of it, I think it right to put it out of my own power" (p. 867).

(i) Letter to James Martin, September 1813:

"I am for responsibilities at short periods, seeing neither reason nor safety in making public functionaries independent of the Nation for life, or even for long terms of years. On this principle I prefer the Presidential term of 4 years, to that of 7 years, which I myself had at first suggested, annexing to it, however, ineligibility forever after; and I wish it were now annexed to the second quadrennial election of President" (p. 866).

(j) Autobiography, 1821:

"The reeligibility of the President for life (in the new Constitution), I quite disapproved. * * * My fears of that feature were founded on the importance of the office, on the fierce contentions it might excite among ourselves, if continuable for life, and the dangers of interference, either with money or arms, by foreign nations, to whom the choice of an American President might become interesting. * * * My wish, therefore, was that the President should be elected for 7 years, and be ineligible afterward. This term I thought sufficient to enable him, with the concurrence of the legislature, to carry through and establish any system of improvement he should propose for the general good. But the practice adopted, I think is better, allowing his continuance for 8 years, with a liability to be dropped at halfway of the term, making that a period of probation. * * * The example of four Presidents voluntarily retiring at the end of their eighth year, and the progress of public opinion, that the principle is salutary, have given it in practice the force of precedent and usage; insomuch, that, should a President consent to be a candidate for a third election, I trust he would be rejected, on this demonstration of ambitious views" (pp. 866-867).

James Madison also mentioned this question in a letter to Robert Lee, February 22, 1830, which will be found in the letters and other writings of James Madison, volume 4, pages 66 and 67, published by J. B. Lippincott & Co., 1865. The pertinent part of which reads as follows:

"The question of reeligibility in the case of a President of the United States admits of rival views, and is the more delicate because it cannot be decided with equal lights from actual experiment. In general, it may be observed, that the evils most complained of are less connected with that particular question than with the process of electing the Chief Magistrate, and the powers vested in him. Among these, the appointing power is the most operative in relation to the purity of government and the tranquillity of republican government, and it is not easy to find a depository for it more free from the dangers of abuse. The powers and patronage of a Chief Magistrate, whether elected for a shorter term and reeligible for a second, or for a longer, without that capacity, might not, in their effect, be very materially different, though the difference might not be unimportant."

Andrew Jackson was as prolific on this subject as Jefferson. In six of his annual messages to Congress he discussed the subject—the references being found in Richardson's Messages and Papers of the Presidents, volume III, pages 1011, 1082, 1120, 1168, 1253, 1336 (J81.B97):

(a) First Annual Message to Congress, December 1829:

"I would therefore recommend such an amendment of the Constitution as may remove all intermediate agency in the election of the President and Vice President. The mode may be so regulated as to preserve to each State its present relative weight in the election, and a failure in the first attempt may be provided for by confining the second to a choice between the two highest candidates. In connection with such an amendment it would seem advisable to limit the service of the Chief Magistrate to a single term of either 4 or 6 years. If, however, it should not be adopted, it is worthy of consideration whether a provision disqualifying for office the Representatives in Congress on whom such an election may have devolved would not be proper" (p. 1011).

(b) Second Annual Message to Congress, December 6, 1830:

"It was a leading object with the framers of the Constitution to keep as separate as possible the action of the legislative and executive branches of the Government. To secure this object nothing is more essential than to preserve the former from all temptations of private interest, and therefore so to direct the patronage of the latter as not to permit such temptations to be offered. Experience abundantly demonstrates that every precaution in this respect is a valuable safeguard of liberty and one which my reflections upon the tendencies of our system incline me to think should be made still stronger. It was for this reason that, in connection with an amendment of the Constitution removing all intermediate agency in the choice of the President, I recommend some restrictions upon the reeligibility of that officer and upon the tenure of offices generally. The reason still exists, and I renew the recommendation with an increased confidence that its adoption will strengthen those checks by which the Constitution designed to secure the independence of each department of the Government and promote the healthful and equitable administration of all the trusts which it has created. The agent most likely to contravene this design of the Constitution is the Chief Magistrate. In order, particularly, that his appointment may as far as possible be placed beyond the reach of any improper influences; in order that he may approach the solemn responsibilities of the highest office in the gift of a free people uncommitted to any other course than the strict line of constitutional duty, and that the securities for this independence may be rendered as strong as the nature of power and the weakness of its possessor will admit, I cannot too earnestly invite your attention to the propriety of promoting such an amendment of the Constitution as will render him ineligible after one term of service" (p. 1082).

(c) Third Annual Message to Congress, December 6, 1831:

"I have heretofore recommended amendments of the Federal Constitution giving the election of President and Vice President to the people and limiting the service of the former to a single term. So important do I consider these changes in our fundamental law that I cannot, in accordance with my sense of duty, omit to press them upon the consideration of a new Congress. For my views more at large, as well in relation to these points as to the disqualification of Members of Congress to receive an office from a President in whose election they have had an official agency, which I propose as a substitute, I refer you to my former messages" (p. 1120).

(d) Fourth Annual Message to Congress, December 4, 1832:

"I beg leave to call the attention of Congress to the views heretofore expressed in relation to the mode of choosing the President and Vice President of the United States, and to those respecting the tenure of office generally. Still impressed with the justness of those views and with the belief that the modifications suggested on those subjects if adopted will contribute to the prosperity and harmony of the country, I earnestly recommend them to your consideration at this time" (p. 1168).

(e) Fifth Annual Message to Congress, December 3, 1833:

"I would also call your attention to the views I have heretofore expressed of the propriety of amending the Constitution in relation to the mode of electing the President and the Vice President of the United States. Regarding it as all important to the future quiet and harmony of the people that every intermediate agency in the election of these officers should be removed and that their eligibility should be limited to one term of either 4 or 6 years, I cannot too earnestly invite your consideration of the subject" (p. 1253)

(f) Sixth Annual Message to Congress, December 1, 1834:

"I trust that I may be also pardoned for renewing the recommendation I have so often submitted to your attention in regard to the mode of electing the President and Vice President of the United States. All the reflection I have been able to bestow upon the subject increases my conviction that the best interests of the country will be promoted by the adoption of some plan which will secure in all contingencies that important right of sovereignty to the direct control of the people. Could this be attained, and the terms of those officers be limited to a single period of either 4 or 6 years, I think our liberties would possess an additional safeguard" (p. 1336).

James K. Polk addressed the House of Representatives, February 25, 1835, "In discussion of joint resolutions on subject of election of President and Vice President of the United States," found in the Congressional Globe, February 25, 1835, Twenty-third Congress, second session, page 292:

"Mr. Polk said, he believed he had discovered a very important omission in the resolution. They nowhere stated the number of votes to which each State was entitled, although they laid down the mode and manner in which the elections should be held. Mr. P. was for a single term; against an election by that House, and would, in all cases, confine the election to the people; but he did not think that they should pass upon so weighty a subject in half an hour's deliberation."

James Buchanan also discussed this matter in the House of Representatives on February 6, 1829, the reference appearing in Gales and Seaton, Register of Debates in Congress, February 6, 1829, Twentieth Congress, second session, page 321. The remarks reading as follows:

"The example of Washington, which has been followed by Jefferson, Madison, and Monroe, has forever determined that no President shall be more than once reelected. This principle is now become as sacred as if it were written in the Constitution. I would incline to leave to the people of the United States, without incorporating it in the Constitution, to decide whether a President should serve longer than one term. The day may come when dangers shall lower over us, and when we may have a President at the helm of State who possesses the confidence of the country, and is better able to weather the storm than any other pilot; shall we, then, under such circumstances, deprive the people of the United States of the power of obtaining his services for a second term? Shall we pass a decree, as fixed as fate, to bind the American people and prevent them from ever reelecting such a man? I am not afraid to trust them with this power."

Andrew Johnson, in his message to Congress, July 18, 1868, made recommendations for a constitutional amendment. The recommendation reading in part:

"My object in this communication is to suggest certain defects in the Constitution which seem to me to require correction, and to recommend that the judgment of the people be taken on the amendments proposed.

"The first of the defects to which I desire to direct attention is in that clause of the Constitution which provides for the election of President and Vice President through the intervention of electors, and not be an immediate vote of the people. The importance of so amending this clause as to secure to the people the election of President and Vice President by their direct votes was urged with great earnestness and ability by President Jackson in his first annual message, and the recommendation was repeated in five of his subsequent communications to Congress, extending through the 8 years of his administration. In his message of 1829, he said:

* * * * *

"I would therefore recommend such an amendment of the Constitution as may remove all intermediate agency in the election of the President and Vice President. * * * In connection with such an amendment it would seem advisable to limit the service of the Chief Magistrate to a single term of either 4 or 6 years.

* * * * *

"I feel called upon by an imperative sense of duty to revive substantially the recommendation so often and so earnestly made by President Jackson, and to urge that the amendment to the Constitution herewith presented, or some similar proposition, may be submitted to the people for their ratification or rejection." (Richardson's Messages and Papers of the Presidents, vol. VIII, pp. 3838, 3839.)

In Johnson's message to Congress on December 9, 1868, he wrote as follows:

"I renew the recommendation contained in my communication to Congress dated the 18th July last—a copy of which accompanies this message—that the judgment of the people should be taken on the propriety of so amending the Federal Constitution that it shall provide—

"First, for an election of President and Vice President by a direct vote of the people, instead of through the agency of electors, and making them ineligible for reelection to a second term.

* * * * *

"Profoundly impressed with the propriety of making these important modifications in the Constitution, I respectfully submit them for the early and mature consideration of Congress. We should, as far as possible, remove all pretext for violations of the organic law, by remedying such imperfections as time and experience may develop, ever remembering that 'the Constitution which at any time exists until changed by an explicit and authentic act of the whole people is sacredly obligatory upon all.'" (Richardson's Messages and Papers of the Presidents, vol. VIII, p. 3889.)

In the Senate on March 22, 1875, appearing in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, Forty-fourth Congress, special session of the Senate, page 123, the following appears:

"I know the determination of that people (in Louisiana). Their great object is to be restored back into the Union upon equal footing with all the other States, and have a fair participation in the legislation of the country. That is all they desire. But what is that to those who are acting behind the curtain and who are aspiring to retain power, and if it cannot be had by popular consent and the approval of their public acts would inaugurate a system of terrorism, and in the midst of the excitement, in the midst of the war cry triumphantly ride into the Presidency for a third Presidential term; and when that is done, farewell to the liberties of the country.

* * * * * *

"It is my honest conviction that the real meaning of all this is a desire for a third term for the Presidency of the United States, violating the example that Washington set and which has become equal to a part of the Constitution by the general acquiescence and approval and almost looked upon as sacred as if it was a part of the Constitution itself. Even Washington, the Father of his Country, when he had served 4 years, wanted to retire at the expiration of his first term. He thought that was long enough, and his farewell address was partly prepared at the termination of his first term of 4 years; but being prevailed upon by those who surrounded him, in view of the peculiar condition of the country, to accept a second term when that expired, he terminated his connection with the Government. That example has since been pursued and followed and looked upon as a part of the Constitution of the country. But I suppose it is almost out of order to refer to Washington now. Is not the present condition of affairs humiliating when we look at the example that he set in many things? Look at the great probity of his character. When he accepted office, what did he say in reference to the morals of the country and the expenditures of the Government? In his message that he sent to Congress with regard to making provision for the executive department he asked them to make no further provision for the executive department than was absolutely necessary to defray the legitimate expenses of the office. We know, furthermore, that Washington was opposed to a third term, and set the example of serving but two."

And in a letter to Gen. Harry White, President Grant wrote on May 29, 1875, as follows:

"A short time subsequent to the Presidential election of 1872, the press, a portion of it hostile to the Republican Party, and particularly so to the administration, started the cry of 'Caesarism' and 'The Third Term,' calling lustily for me to define my position on the latter subject. I believed it to be beneath the dignity of the office which I have been twice called upon to fill to answer such a question before the subject should be presented by competent authority to make a nomination, or by a body of such dignity and authority as not to make a reply a fair subject of ridicule. * * * But a body of the dignity and party authority of a convention to make nominations for the State officers of the second State in the Union having considered this question, I deem it not improper that I should speak.

"In the first place, I never sought the office for a second, nor even for a first nomination. To the first I was called from a life position, one created by Congress expressly for me for supposed services rendered to the Republic. * * * Without seeking the office for the second term, the nomination was tendered to me by a unanimous vote of the delegates of all the States and Territories selected by the Republicans of each to represent their whole number for the purpose of making their nomination. * * *

"Now, for the third term. I do not want it any more than I did the first time. I would not write or utter a word to change the will of the people in expressing and having their choice. The question of the number of terms allowed to any one Executive can only come up fairly in the shape of a proposition to amend the Constitution, a shape in which all political parties can participate, fixing the length of time or the number of terms for which any one person shall be eligible for the office of President. Until such an amendment is adopted the people cannot be restricted in their choice by resolution further than they are now restricted as to age, nativity, etc. It may happen in the future history of the country that to change an Executive because he has been 8 years in office will prove unfortunate if not disastrous. The idea that any man could elect himself President, or even renominate himself, is preposterous. It is a reflection upon the intelligence and patriotism of the people to suppose such a thing possible. Any man can destroy his chances for office, but no one can force an election or even a nomination.

"To recapitulate, I am not, nor have I ever been, a candidate for a renomination. I would not accept a nomination if it were tendered, unless it should come under such circumstances as to make it an imperative duty, circumstances not likely to arise." (New York Tribune, May 31, 1875, col. 4, p. 1.)

Rutherford B. Hayes recommended in his inaugural address the amendment of the Constitution along the lines provided for in Senate Joint Resolution 18. His recommendation reading:

"In furtherance of the reform we seek, and in other important respects a change of great importance, I recommend an amendment to the Constitution prescribing a term of 6 years for the Presidential office and forbidding a reelection." (Richardson's Messages and Papers of the Presidents, vol. IX, p. 4397.)

And in the Grover Cleveland Addresses, State Papers, and Letters, page 52, Alfred E. Bergh quotes a letter from Cleveland accepting a nomination for President, dated August 18, 1884, reading:

"Then an election to office shall be the selection by the voters of one of their number to assume for a time a public trust, instead of his dedication to the profession of politics; when the holders of the ballot, quickened by a sense of duty, shall avenge truth betrayed and pledges broken, and when the suffrage shall be altogether free and uncorrupted, the full realization of a government by the people will be at hand. And of the means to this end not one would, in my judgment, be more effective than an amendment to the Constitution disqualifying the President from reelection. When we consider the patronage of this great office, the allurements of power, the temptations to retain public place once gained, and, more than all, the availability a party finds in an incumbent whom a horde of office holders, with a zeal born of benefits received and fostered by the hope of favors yet to come, stand ready to aid with money and trained political service, we recognize in the eligibility of the President for reelection a most serious danger to that calm, deliberate, and intelligent political action which must characterize a government by the people."

William McKinley also issued a public statement in reference to this matter under date of June 10, 1901, which is contained in House Report 885, Sixty-second Congress, second session, page 7, reading:

"I regret that the suggestion of a third term has been made. I doubt whether I am called upon to give to it notice, but there are new questions of the gravest importance before the administration and the country, and their just consideration should not be prejudiced in the public mind by even the suspicion of the thought of a third term.

"In view, therefore, of the reiteration of the suggestion of it I will now say, once for all, expressing a long-settled conviction, that I not only am not and will not be a candidate for a third term, but I would not accept a nomination for it if it were tendered to me.

"My only ambition is to serve through my second term to the acceptance of my countrymen, whose generous confidence I so deeply appreciate, and then with them to do my duty in the ranks of private citizenship."

And Theodore Roosevelt, in a public statement of November 8, 1904, as reported in House Report 885, Sixty-second Congress, second session, pages 7-8, reads:

"On the 4th of March next I shall have served 3½ years, and this 3½ years constitute my first term. The wise custom which limits the President to two terms regards the substance and not the form, and under no circumstances will I be a candidate for or accept another nomination."

Roosevelt at a later date changed his mind in reference to this and running for office on the Bull Moose was defeated.

William Howard Taft, in a lecture at Columbia University in 1915, which was later published in book form (Our Chief Magistrate and His Powers, by W. H. Taft, Columbia University Press, 1916) said:

"I am strongly inclined to the view that it would have been a wiser provision, as it was at one time voted in the Convention, to make the term of the President 6 or 7 years, and render him ineligible thereafter. Such a change would give to the Executive greater courage an i independence in the discharge of his duties. The absorbing and diverting interest in the reelection of the incumbent, taken by those Federal civil servants who regard their own tenure as dependent upon his, would disappear and the efficiency of administration in the last 18 months of a term would be maintained."

Calvin Coolidge's autobiography, published in 1929, pages 239 to 247, contains some very interesting comments on this situation. Extracts appearing herein cover his views in some detail.

"The Presidential office takes a heavy toll of those who occupy it and those who are dear to them. While we should not refuse to spend and be spent in the service of our country, it is hazardous to attempt what we feel is beyond our strength to accomplish (p. 239).

"Irrespective of the third-term policy, the Presidential office is of such a nature that it is difficult to conceive how one man can successfully serve the country for a term of more than 8 years.

"While I am in favor of continuing the long-established custom of the country in relation to a third term for a President, yet I do not think that the practice applies to one who has succeeded to a part of a term as Vice President. Others might argue that it does, but I doubt if the country would so consider it.

"Although my own health has been practically perfect, yet the duties are very great and 10 years would be a very heavy strain. It would be especially long for the mistress of the White House. Mrs. Coolidge has been in more than usual good health, but I doubt if she could have stayed there for 10 years without some danger of impairment of her strength (p. 240).

"It is difficult for men in high office to avoid the malady of self-delusion. They are always surrounded by worshippers. They are constantly, and for the most part sincerely, assured of their greatness.

"They live in an artificial atmosphere of adulation and exaltation which sooner or later impairs their judgment. They are in grave danger of becoming careless and arrogant.

"The chances of having wise and faithful public service are increased by a change in the Presidential office after a moderate length of time.

"It is necessary for the head of the Nation to differ with many people who are honest in their opinions. As his term progresses, the number who are disappointed accumulates. Finally, there is so large a body who have lost confidence in him that he meets a rising opposition which makes his efforts less effective.

"In the higher ranges of public service men appear to come forward to perform a certain duty. When it is performed their work is done. They usually find it impossible to readjust themselves in the thought of the people so as to pass on successfully to the solution of new public problems.

"An examination of the records of those Presidents who have served 8 years will disclose that in almost every instance the latter part of their term has shown very little in the way of constructive accomplishment. They have often been clouded with grave disappointments.

"While I had a desire to be relieved of the pretensions and delusions of public life, it was not because of any attraction of pleasure or idleness (p. 241-242).

"The Presidential office differs from everything else. Much of it cannot be described, it can only be felt. After I had considered the reasons for my being a candidate on the one side and on the other, I could not say that any of them moved me with compelling force.

"My election seemed assured. Nevertheless, I felt it was not best for the country that I should succeed myself. A new impulse is more likely to be beneficial.

"It was therefore my privilege, after seeing my administration so strongly endorsed by the country, to retire voluntarily from the greatest experience that can come to mortal man. In that way I believed I could best serve the people who have honored me and the country which I love" (p. 246-247).

Two Presidents openly opposed the limitation on terms of office for Presidents—John Quincy Adams and Woodrow Wilson. Adams in his memoirs, taken from his diary from 1795 to 1848, vol. IV, pages 451-452, printed by J. B. Lippincott & Co., wrote:

"Upon all subject of eminent importance Crawford's opinion is becoming whatever is not mine. I lament this, because its tendency must be to weaken and distract the public councils; but the seeds of this discord are sown in the practice which the Virginia Presidents have taken so much pains to engraft upon the Constitution of the Union, making it a principle that no President can be more than twice elected, and that whoever is not thrown out after one term of service must decline being a candidate after the second. This is not a principle of the Constitution, and I am satisfied that it ought not to be. Its inevitable consequence is to make every administration a scene of continual and furious electioneering for the succession to the Presidency. It was so during the whole of Mr. Madison's administration, and is so now."

Woodrow Wilson wrote a letter to Hon. A. Mitchell Palmer, of Pennsylvania, on February 5, 1913, which will be found in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, Sixty-fourth Congress, first session, page 12620, reading:

"It was characteristically considerate of you to ask my views with regard to the joint resolution which has just come over from the House to the Senate with regard to the Presidential term.

"I have not hitherto said anything about this question, because I had not observed that there was any evidence that the public was very much interested in it. I must have been mistaken in this, else the Senate would hardly have acted so promptly upon it.

"It is a matter which concerns the character and conduct of the great office upon the duties of which I am about to enter. I feel therefore that in the present circumstances I should not be acting consistently with my ideals with regard to the rule of entire frankness and plain speaking that ought to exist between public servants and the public whom they serve if I did not speak out about it without reserve of any kind and without thought of personal embarrassment.

"The question is simply this: Shall our Presidents be free, so far as the law is concerned, to seek a second term of 4 years, or shall they be limited by constitutional amendment to a single term of 4 years or to a single term extended to 6 years?

"I can approach the question from a perfectly impersonal point of view, because I shall most cheerfully abide by the judgment of my party and the public as to whether I shall be a candidate for the Presidency again in 1916. * * *

"Four years is too long a term for a President who is not the true spokesman of the people, who is imposed upon and does not lead. It is too short a term for a President who is doing, or attempting a great work of reform, and who has not had time to finish it.

"To change the term to 6 years would be to increase the likelihood of its being too long, without any assurance that it would, in happy cases, be long enough. A fixed constitutional limitation to a single term of office is highly arbitrary and unsatisfactory from every point of view.

"The argument for it rests upon temporary conditions which can easly be removed by law. Presidents, it is said are effective for one-half of their term only because they devote their attention during the last 2 years of the term to building up the influence, and above all, the organization, by which they hope and propose to secure a second nomination and election.

* * * * *

"Put the present customary limitation of two terms into the Constitution, if you do not trust the people to take care of themselves, but make it two terms (not one, because 4 years is often too long), and give the President a chance to win the full service by proving himself fit for it.

"As things stand now the people might more likely be cheated than served by further limitations of the President's eligibility. His fighting power in their behalf would be immensely weakened. No one will fear a President except those whom he can make fear the election.

"We singularly belie our own principles by seeking to determine by fixed constitutional provision what the people shall determine for themselves and are perfectly competent to determine for themselves. We cast a doubt upon the whole theory of popular government.

"I believe that we should fatally embarrass ourselves if we made the constitutional change proposed. If we want our Presidents to fight our battles for us, we should give them the means, the legitimate means, the means their opponents will always have. Strip them of everything else but the right to appeal to the people, but leave them that; suffer them to be leaders, absolutely prevent them from being bosses."

Note his comments on fighting the people's battles.

Roosevelt's ideas are too well known to need comment. It seems that those who are not in favor of limiting the terms of men in the office of President are perfectly willing to lead the Nation into war.

Insofar as the dangers incident to the Judiciary are concerned I can do no better than to quote the statement which I made orally before the subcommittee:

"The dangers to the Judiciary appear to me to be very clear cut also. The framers of the Constitution gave to the Federal Judiciary life tenure in order to remove the temptation to 'play politics.' However, when one man is in control of the appointment of members of the Judiciary, it appears to me that there is a serious danger of a disproportionate number of judges who are of the same political, economic and social theories as the man who makes the appointments. I believe it far better to have a well balanced judiciary and I also believe that is impossible when one man has the opportunity through length of service to appoint a majority of the judges either in the inferior courts or the Supreme Court of the United States."

In addition to the dangers which I have pointed out, as I see them, there are two additional reasons why I favor the resolution which I have introduced.

One of them is that I believe firmly in the theory of rotation in office. I do not consider any man indispensable to the service of the people of the United States. In my judgment there are many, many thousands who can fill any office of public honor or trust in the United States in a thoroughly satisfactory and efficient manner. Why then should a small group hold on to such places year after year and thus deprive other citizens who are well qualified from exercising their talents and ability for the common good of all citizens of the United States. Such a system will bring men to the Congress with a fresh viewpoint, with an understanding of the problems which are confronting the ordinary citizen who does not hold public office, and generally with a better understanding of the law needed to give everyone a fair chance, than would be the case if the greater part of their experience was with the people who make and enforce the laws rather than the people who have to endeavor to make a living under them.

It is also my firm belief that every man who votes for a law should later be required to go back into private life and endeavor to make a living under the laws which he has helped to enact. When that time comes I believe that we will have much more thoughtful consideration of the effect that the application of such laws will have than is the case at present. If a man knows that the law which he helps enact will affect him personally the law will become a personal thing, instead of the highly impersonal thing which is to alter the lives and ways of earning a living of someone else. Such at least is my theory and I hope that I will have an opportunity to see it work out.

The other reason for advocating the approval of the resolution is that when a man retires from public office under the provisions of this amendment he will have many years in which he can be of service to the people in his community as a connecting link with government. Such is not now the custom. When a man retires from public office now, he is either seeking another public office or he is too old to be of great value to the people of his community as a civic leader. Either, as a general rule, he retires because of age or ill health or he is retired by his constituents and carries back with him to his home community either a desire to rest for the remainder of his life or a burning desire for vindication by being reelected.

While the main purpose of my amendment is to bring about an improvement in our Government which will be beneficial to the rank and file of our people, yet the proposal is not wholly without benefit to those who serve in these public offices.

When once one is elected to a Federal position he soon finds himself hemmed in between two raging fires. His friends shower praise or flattery upon him, insisting that he is the one man who can save democracy and urging him to run for reelection. On the other hand, his enemies pour out their poison propaganda that he is a complete failure and would not dare to run again because he would face certain defeat.

Between these two fires, his pride and his esteem for his friends prompt him to run again, while his fearless courage and his desire to prove that his enemies are wrong also urge him to run.

Thus, he accepts the challenge and starts down the long pathway of a most nerve-wracking vocation which offers little remuneration and only controversial fame, but in time definitely brings certain defeat and humiliation or an untimely death.

For these reasons, I urge favorable action on Senate Joint Resolution 18.

Mr. O'DANIEL. Mr. President, it seems to me that if we are going to upset the elective machinery of the Government, which has been in operation ever since the United States became a nation, and if we are to start limiting the tenure of office of one of the elective officials of our Government, we should not be selfish about it but should go all the way and take such action in regard to all elective officials of the United States Government. There may be differences of opinion as to exactly what benefit will accrue from limiting the tenure of office of the President; but if we are going to discuss and act on the subject of tenure of office, I see no reason why we should confine our discussions and actions solely to the question of the tenure of office of the President. In my judgment we should discuss the subject fully and act on it fully, rather than to have the legislative branch of government pick on the President and take the position that while great harm may result to the Nation from long tenure in the Presidential office the same objections cannot be raised to long tenure by those who serve in the Senate and the House of Representatives. I know that the subject of limiting the tenure of office of the President has been discussed for many years. I do not know that any other resolution to include all the other elective officials of the Government under such a limitation of tenure has previously been offered. However, in fairness and equity and justice, I think the whole problem should be considered at this time.

It may be that we are not now ready to go all the way because of our personal interest in the matter. At any rate, the subject is at present up for discussion, and I have offered my joint resolution as a substitute for the pending joint resolution. I certainly trust that it will receive consideration and will be adopted as a substitute.

Mr. TAFT. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Ninety Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present.

The question is on agreeing to the first amendment reported by the committee.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, may we have the amendment stated?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The clerk will state the amendment.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 1, line 6, after the words "ratified by", it is proposed to strike out "the legislatures of three-fourths of the several States," and to insert "conventions in the several States, as provided in the Constitution."

Mr. McCLELLAN. Mr. President, this amendment, and one other amendment proposed to this joint resolution, in my judgment, are very objectionable. I had considered and am inclined to vote for a resolution of this character, limiting the terms of the President, but I do not believe that the convention method of ratification is the best method to carry out democratic processes, although the convention method is authorized by the Constitution. I much more favor the House joint resolution as originally passed by the House, without the Senate committee amendments in it.

There is no hurry; there is no emergency; we are under no stress to get this proposed constitutional amendment adopted immediately. A period of 7 years' time is given, under the terms of the joint resolution, for the amendment to be ratified by three-fourths of the States. If it provided that it be ratified by the legislatures of the several States, then it would afford opportunity for those who seek legislative positions in their respective States to discuss the issue in future campaigns. The people could be advised, and candidates would be afforded opportunity to state their positions, and by that method and through that process the people would have a better opportunity of making a choice and having their sentiments expressed as to the ratification or rejection of the amendment than they will have if the convention process is adopted.

For this reason, Mr. President, I shall vote against the Senate amendments providing for ratification by conventions. If the joint resolution shall be presented in the form as it passed the House, then I shall be inclined to favor it. But I know that the process of ratification through action of the State legislatures affords the best opportunity for getting the correct sentiment of the people, because legislators are elected, whereas in many States delegates to conventions are appointed and the question is not made an issue and debated before the citizenship and the electorate, before the votes are cast.

Mr. President, I shall not vote for the committee amendments providing for conventions, and I trust they will be rejected. I wanted to make this explanation of my views regarding the Senate committee amendments before any vote was taken.

I shall not vote for the committee amendments, and I trust that they will be defeated. I wanted to make that explanation of my views regarding the Senate amendments before any vote was taken on them.

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, in regard to the pending amendment which proposes to strike out "the legislatures of three-fourths of the several States," and insert the words "conventions in the several States, as provided in the Constitution," I desire to state that in committee, as I recall the change was brought about largely due to the insistence of some of the Democratic Members, and I believe I am stating their argument correctly when I say they felt that conventions to consider and act on proposed constitutional amendments were nearer to the people. I could not agree with that, but their contention was that if under the Constitution conventions were held, representatives to the conventions would be elected on the specific issue. That was their position.

I personally stated in my opening argument on the floor, as I now repeat that I held to the opposite position, but I went along with the committee because in my opinion in order to accomplish results in considering proposed legislation there must be give and take. That is the situation as it appears to the chairman of the Judiciary Committee, and I repeat that it was largely due to the insistence of the Democratic Members that this language was inserted.

Mr. REVERCOMB. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WILEY. I yield to the Senator from West Virginia.

Mr. REVERCOMB. I join the able chairman of the Judiciary Committee in the statement that there was some disagreement in the committee. As a matter of fact, I was one of those who thought that perhaps the best method of passing on the proposed amendment was through action by the State legislatures. However, after some discussion it was generally agreed to submit the amendment in the form in which it now appears.

The question was addressed to me, which I now want to address to the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary, whether or not it is incumbent upon the Senate to set up the machinery for holding conventions, or whether that must be left to the separate States; that is, in allocating the number of delegates to a convention, and prescribing how the convention shall be held. I would like an answer on that question while the pending amendment is before us.

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, in seeking an answer to that question, I turned to the Constitution itself to see if there were any annotations in relation to it. I could find none. It seems to me that the machinery of the several States would go into operation without further direction from the Congress. In other words, power is conferred on the States to organize conventions.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WILEY. I am very happy to yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. The only instance within my recollection in which conventions were provided for was on the submission of the repeal of the eighteenth amendment. I would have to refresh my recollection, but as I recall it the whole matter of providing machinery for conventions was left to the State legislatures.

Mr. WILEY. That is correct.

Mr. BARKLEY. The Senate did not undertake to write out a blueprint of how the States should select their delegates. As a rule, there are no provisions in State statutes for the calling of such conventions. My recollection is that in case the State did not have such machinery, the legislature had to enact a law providing for the calling of a convention, the determination of representation, and so forth. It also had to pay the expense of the election and of the convention.

Mr. WILEY. That is my understanding.

Mr. REVERCOMB. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WILEY. I yield.

Mr. REVERCOMB. Following the remarks of the Senator from Kentucky, is it not a fact that in some instances the State legislatures resolved themselves into conventions, sitting as conventions, even though they were regularly elected members of the legislatures? Can the Senator from Kentucky advise me upon that point? I have heard it raised.

Mr. BARKLEY. I would not be able to answer that question without further inquiry. It would be possible, I have no doubt, for the legislature to provide for a convention made up of its own members; and while it was sitting as a convention, it would not be acting as a legislature. That is a sort of fiction of legislative process, but it is not impossible for it to be done in that way, in my judgment.

Mr. REVERCOMB. It would be within the province of the legislature to determine the method to be followed.

Mr. BARKLEY. Yes, absolutely; because I recall only one case in which the Congress attempted to set up the machinery within the State and to prescribe the method by which the convention of the State should be called.

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, I think the Senator from Kentucky has confirmed my own conclusion, which is, that when the Constitution was written, using this language, no power was taken away from the States with respect to regulating how, when, and where the conventions should be held. Rather, the States had inherent power or derived therefrom the Constitution to hold conventions. If the Congress, on the other hand, had decided to set up machinery pursuant to the Constitution, then I think that would be guiding; at least, it would determine the direction that the States should take. But my recollection from a cursory review of the subject is the same as that of the Senator from Kentucky, that the States themselves, either pursuant to a legislative enactment already on the books, or pursuant to legislative action that followed the proposed amendment, would take action prescribing how the conventions were to be held. I conclude with that statement.

Mr. MAGNUSON. Of course, the action of the committee, changing the method of ratification from the State legislatures to conventions, held under the Constitution, is only a quasi modification of the original proposal, because, as the Senator from Kentucky has well said, in order to hold a convention under the Constitution, while the State legislature has to act, it can act in one of two ways: It can convert itself into a State convention for this purpose and sit as such, or it can provide that on a date certain, a special election shall be held at which delegates shall be elected to a State convention.

In my own State when it came to the repeal of the eighteenth amendment, the legislature acted and provided that on a day certain there should be a convention held for the purpose of repealing the eighteenth amendment, and it set up the machinery whereby the delegates were to be elected, and required them to state their position on filing, whether in favor of repealing or in favor of retaining the amendment. In 1933, I myself was a delegate in my own State.

In my judgment, the committee amendment represents only a half-way modification. Suppose a State legislature not to be in favor of this proposal; then all it would need to do would be to fail to set up the machinery for a convention.

What the chairman of the committee said of the Democratic members is true; we did feel that if this proposed amendment were to be submitted to the people it should be submitted directly to them, and that, if the State legislatures were to follow out the procedure under the Constitution, there would be really a democratic plebiscite, showing whether or not the people wanted the Constitution amended in the manner proposed. As a matter of fact, it offers both systems, because the State legislatures can act as members of the conventions. It depends on the State. It would not violate State rights. We thought it a good amendment.

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, there seems to be no disagreement in relation to the appropriate answer to the question of the Senator from West Virginia, and that is that the power is in the States to determine how conventions shall be held.

Mr. McCLELLAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WILEY. Yes; I yield.

Mr. McCLELLAN. I merely want to make an observation in reply to the Senator from Washington. He says that the legislature can act, and that if the legislature failed to act there would never be an expression of sentiment on the proposed amendment. The legislature in my State is elected every 2 years, and I presume the same practice prevails in most of the other States. If the legislature does not act the first time the question is presented to it the people can elect a legislature which will act, if the people want action taken. The States do not have to act on the question at all. They do not have to call conventions. They do not have to act either way. Unless the matter is agitated, and the people are concerned about it, and want to vote on it, and want their State to approve or disapprove the constitutional amendment, there is no reason for calling for a convention to be held. The machinery is already in existence by which action can be had. The legislature of a State can act on the question. If one legislature does not act on it, and the people want the legislature to act on it, they can themselves elect other legislators who will act. In my humble judgment, Mr. President, the legislative method is the best method for action to be taken on this question. In that manner we can obtain an intelligent expression of sentiment from the people.

Mr. MAGNUSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WILEY. I yield.

Mr. MAGNUSON. As the Senator from Arkansas well knows, an individual who runs for the State legislature sometimes runs on various planks of a platform. He may be in favor of a road to be built over here, or something to be done over there and, in his campaign, he may only incidentally mention that a constitutional amendment will be before the State legislature for consideration. But State legislatures which really represent the people of their States will submit the specific question to the people, and the people can act on it. We Democratic members of the Committee on the Judiciary, who are always for pure democracy as we see it, voted for the convention form of action, and I think, of course, it is the best system.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WILEY. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. I wonder if those members of the committee who believe in pure democracy and therefore the submission of the proposed constitutional amendment to State conventions would vote for an amendment to the joint resolution providing for a really pure manifestation of democracy by having the President of the United States elected by popular vote instead of by the electoral college? That would really be a pure democracy.

Mr. REVERCOMB and Mr. LUCAS addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, I presume the last question was addressed to me.

Mr. BARKLEY. It was addressed over the Senator's shoulder to the Senator from Washington.

Mr. WILEY. Then, in the interest of brevity, I shall not attempt to answer it.

I gladly yield to the Senator from West Virginia.

Mr. REVERCOMB. Mr. President, to recur to the question at hand, it seems to me that the one conclusion to be drawn from this discussion with respect to the matter of submission to the State legislatures or to State conventions is that the determination finally will rest with the legislature itself. The legislature itself will determine whether it will sit as a convention or whether it will provide for a special convention. I say that to the able Senator from Arkansas with great respect for his views. The legislature itself will determine whether it shall itself act upon the question or provide for a special convention. If we were to limit the action to a special convention, which I take it we cannot do, and do not so provide by the joint resolution, that would be one thing. But the question is referred to the legislature of the State, which may resolve itself into a convention and the members of the legislature may act as delegates to the convention, although they are members of the legislature—the same members that the able Senator from Arkansas wants to act upon the question. So I do not think it is very important, Mr. President, whether the constitutional amendment be referred to the legislature or referred to a special State convention. If it is referred to a special convention, to be ratified by the convention, the legislature will determine whether it shall act in both capacities, whether the legislature shall resolve itself into a convention, or whether it shall call a special convention. It seems to me that the question is rather unimportant.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WILEY. I yield.

Mr. LUCAS. If I may, I should like, in the time of the Senator, to make one observation with respect to the views of the able Senator from West Virginia. Obviously, I am not acquainted with what the West Virginia Legislature might do, but I undertake to say that the Legislature of Illinois would not dare, under the laws of our State, or under the Constitution of the United States, to attempt to sit as a convention on a serious question of this kind under a resolution of this character. In my opinion, it is mandatory that the legislature call a convention. So much for that.

I ask this question of the Senator from Wisconsin. The joint resolution, as I understand, was introduced by the Senator from Wisconsin. Am I correct?

Mr. WILEY. The one now pending is a House measure. I believe I did introduce one joint resolution on the subject. I think there were a series of resolutions.

Mr. REVERCOMB. Several of them.

Mr. WILEY. This is really a committee joint resolution.

Mr. LUCAS. Whoever introduced the measure originally provided that the constitutional amendment should be ratified by the legislatures of three-fourths of the several States.

Mr. WILEY. That is the provision of the House joint resolution.

Mr. LUCAS. That is the measure that came to the Senate Judiciary Committee, as I understand, and at least one measure introduced in the Senate was of the same nature.

Mr. WILEY. I think there were several.

Mr. LUCAS. What I am inquiring about is what was the persuasive force in the committee that caused the Committee on the Judiciary to change from the House version and from the version originally submitted by some Senators.

Mr. WILEY. I thought I had answered that question. I shall be glad to go over it again. The standing committee to which was referred the various proposals for amendment of the Constitution brought out, I believe, substantially this amendment. I am not positive whether, when it first came before the committee, it provided that it should be ratified by the legislatures of three-fourths of the several States. Then what took place was that the Democratic members of the committee argued very convincingly that the convention method would be nearer to the people and would provide in a more democratic way an answer to the question that would be submitted under the joint resolution than would action by the legislatures. I think that is the substance of what took place.

Mr. LUCAS. Am I to understand the able Senator to say that a couple of Democratic members of the committee convinced him that they were right?

Mr. WILEY. I shall now state the third point: The Committee on the Judiciary is made up of strong individuals. It is not a one-man committee; and in order to assure the measure being reported there had to be give and take. I do not think there is a better committee of the Senate than the Committee on the Judiciary, from the standpoint of acting in a bipartisan or nonpartisan manner. We try to understand each other's viewpoints. The result of our discussion was agreement on the measure now before the Senate, with, as I recall, 1 vote cast against it.

Mr. LUCAS. That leads me to this question. The House of Representatives, as the Senator knows, voted down by quite a majority this same provision when it was offered, as I recall, by Representative COLMER, of Mississippi. What I want to know is: When the Senate passes the joint resolution, how strong a stand are the conferees on the part of the Senate going to take when they meet with the conferees on the part of the House, who are supporting the House version? That is my next question.

Mr. WILEY. Of course, I cannot speak for the conferees. If I happen to be one of them, in view of the position I took in the committee, which I have stated heretofore in the opening argument on the joint resolution, I shall seek for a reasonable time to have the Senate version adopted. I would feel that the conferees would be in the same position that the Democrats and Republicans are on the Committee of the Judiciary. They must give consideration to each other's thoughts, judgments, and convictions, and in that way arrive at a result.

Mr. LUCAS. As I understand, the Senator would try to give and take. What the Senator from Illinois is asking is whether the Senator from Wisconsin will give more than he receives? That is the point.

Mr. WILEY. I doubt whether I could look into the future and say what will happen.

Mr. LUCAS. I ask the question seriously, because the able chairman of the committee will be the important member when the conferees meet. He is chairman of the committee; and whether he comes back here with the House version or whether he comes back with the proposal which is apparently about to be adopted by the Senate will depend upon his power, persuasion, vigor, and force in the conference.

I think it is a very important question, because Senators differ as to the way in which ratification should be effected. We may not have another opportunity to vote on the question after the conferees are through.

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, let me ask the Senator how he feels about this amendment.

Mr. LUCAS. I am for the legislative method. I know how conventions are taken care of. In my judgment, members of the legislature are the proper ones to consider the question. It has been said that the convention system is closer to the people. That is simply not so. A proposal of this kind will be thoroughly understood by everyone, and the delegates will be carefully chosen by those who are vitally interested in seeing this amendment to the Constitution either defeated or passed.

Mr. WILEY. As the Senator has heard me say several times already today, I was in favor of ratification by three-fourths of the legislatures. That was my personal view. But if this amendment should be agreed to by the Senate, I would feel that it would be my duty in conference to attempt to uphold the view of the Senate, and to persuade the House conferees that the Senate's view was correct. However, I realize that the majority of the conference would govern on that question.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WILEY. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. I appreciate the Senator's frankness. I interpret his reply to mean that as chairman of the committee he feels it his duty to support the action of the committee.

Mr. WILEY. And the direction of the Senate.

Mr. BARKLEY. That does not necessarily change the Senator's personal convictions.

Mr. WILEY. That is correct.

Mr. BARKLEY. There is nothing inconsistent about that position. As I indicated a while ago in trying to respond to the question of the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. REVERCOMB], the only time I can now recall when the convention system was adopted was when the amendment repealing the eighteenth amendment was submitted. That was done largely because the question of prohibition was a question which agitated every human breast in America, either for or against it. There was almost fanatical advocacy on one side or the other. When we submitted the eighteenth amendment itself, it was submitted to the States. It was not submitted to conventions. Three-fourths of the States promptly ratified it. But when the question of repeal arose, in view of the agitation and controversy which existed all over the country, in which everyone was interested, and with respect to which everyone would take an interest in a local convention to select delegates to a State convention, it was felt that the convention method would probably be more representative—at least, more recently representative—of the desires of the people, than would be the case with State legislatures which had been previously elected.

As I see it, there is no great popular agitation at the grass roots with respect to this question. It is largely a legalistic, constitutional question. Many persons have convictions one way or the other; but I doubt whether there would be such an outpouring of the people to select delegates to a convention as would be more representative than the legislature elected by the people, although not on that issue.

Does not the Senator feel that in submitting this question to the convention the chances would be very great that it would be a hand-picked convention, whether it was selected by popular vote or whether, as the legislature might provide, the delegates to the State convention were selected in county conventions, which in all likelihood would be sparsely attended, attended by politically minded persons who were interested in the constitutional amendment one way or the other? In my judgment, there would not necessarily be a popular response one way or the other, for or against—certainly no greater popular response than if the question were submitted to the legislatures to be acted upon, as has been done in nearly all cases since the Constitution was adopted.

Mr. WILEY. I will say in reply to the distinguished minority leader that he has stated far better than I did, and probably more persuasively, the exact convictions which I held before the committee. In substance, I stated that I felt that in the States—and I had my own State in mind—if the assemblymen and senators in the two branches of the legislature had this question before them, they, representing relatively small areas or small populations, and being, as was suggested, in contact with the people, would attempt at least to ascertain the wishes of the people. Being politically minded, they would, of course, seek to be guided by the wish of the majority. I felt that such a method would provide as close democratic contact as could be had by means of a convention.

The argument on the other side, as stated by the Senator from Washington [Mr. MAGNUSON], is that the legislative branch of the State government would be concerned with a multitude of problems, as we are here, whereas in a convention men and women would be selected on the basis of a single issue, and with the sole direction to vote for or against the amendment. It would be the only issue under consideration.

As a result, a consensus was arrived at in reporting the joint resolution with this amendment. I think there is much to be said on both sides. If I had not felt that way, I would have voted not to report the joint resolution; but I wanted it to come to the floor of the Senate.

I cannot quite agree with the minority leader that there is not widespread interest in this question. I believe that possibly because of other questions at the present time, foreign and domestic, the minds of men and women are diverted from this subject. I feel that if the question is submitted either to the legislatures or to conventions it will be found that there is a great interest in it. I believe that it will be found—as was true in former days, not so long ago—that large masses of our people, as shown by the Gallup poll, feel the need for a measure of this kind.

At any rate, whatever the Senate does, we shall try to uphold the wishes of the Senate.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WILEY. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. I appreciate the Senator's statement. However, I have a genuine fear that there will not be aroused among all the people a dynamic interest in what happens to this particular amendment if it is submitted. I fear that here may not be the same interest that was aroused, for example, over the question of popular election of United States Senators, which question was submitted to the legislatures of the States. That issue did not involve the question of how long anyone should hold office, but it involved the right of the people to decide for themselves through the popular election of United States Senators, who should hold office. In my judgment there would have been more reason to have submitted that amendment to conventions, where it would have been made an issue in a proceeding to select delegates, than is the case with this particular amendment. The pending amendment does not involve the question of who is to be elected President, or even the method of his election. It merely involves the question of how long he may hold office, provided the people want him to hold office. The people can get rid of him at the expiration of his term without a constitutional amendment, if they wish to do so. They have frequently done so. On occasion the people have applied the same lash to Senators. They have the power to control, at the expiration of the term of any officeholder, how long he shall continue in office, or whether he shall continue in office. But that is slightly different from the right to choose the man himself, which was the question involved in the amendment providing for the direct election of United States Senators. Yet notwithstanding the widespread interest in the right of the people, rather than the legislatures, to elect their Senators, the Congress submitted to those very legislatures the amendment to determine whether Senators should be elected by popular vote. Although that amendment took away from the legislatures the right to elect Senators, the legislatures ratified the amendment by the required number, and since 1912 we have been electing Senators by direct vote of the people.

I have a very distinct fear that this question, which to some people may be very academic—though I recognize its importance and its impact upon future possibilities in regard to the tenure of office—is not likely to arouse a great volume of popular sentiment either for or against the amendment to the extent that a convention would be truly representative and would avoid the possibility that a particular group interested either for or against the adoption of the amendment could hand-pick delegates to the convention. It might not at all represent the will of the people. For that reason I feel that in this case the State legislature is a more desirable repository for the authority to determine whether this amendment shall go into the Constitution than would be a convention under any circumstances, or any procedure.

Most of the members of our legislatures are ambitious men. A large proportion of them always aspire to further political preferment, and they will not consciously wander very far away from the sentiment of the people. Members of a convention could be, and probably would be, specially selected men who might have some particular desire for or against the amendment, which in the long run would not, in my judgment, automatically make it more representative than, or as representative as the legislature.

In my State we elect a legislature this year. It will meet next January; and if this amendment should be submitted to the legislature members of the legislature would not only have an opportunity but could be required by the people to announce how they stood upon the question. So there might be a sort of referendum in the primaries and in the general election.

Mr. WHITE and other Senators addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. WILEY. I yield first to the Senator from Maine.

Mr. WHITE. There is a question which has not been alluded to, but which interests me somewhat in connection with this matter. I have no hesitation in saying that I favor the legislative method rather than the convention method. I suggest for the Senator's consideration the fact that the framers of the joint resolution evidently desired early action upon the proposed amendment, because they wrote into the last paragraph of the joint resolution a limitation of time within which there must be affirmative action either by legislatures or conventions. I assume that was done to avoid delay in bringing to a consummation whatever might be the judgment of the people of the several States.

If I am correct in that assumption I do not see the reason for imposing a further obstacle to legislative action. In the one instance, if the proposed amendment is to be ratified by the legislatures, it will go directly to the State legislatures. The legislatures may be in session and may act immediately, or there may be some delay. But if the convention system is adopted it must go through the legislative process of submission and then of subsequent legislation by the several States. Then comes a new obstacle, namely, that of holding a convention. It does not seem to me that that additional step ought to be required if there is any justification for pressure or for any limitation of time.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, I should like to comment on that suggestion by way of affirmation of the Senator's fears. Many of the legislatures have been in session this year. Most of their sessions are expiring or have expired. If we were to submit this amendment to conventions, and the legislatures should not meet again until next January, they could not even provide for a convention until the session at which they themselves could act upon the amendment if it were submitted to them.

If it were submitted to convention the same legislatures would then be required to devise machinery for a convention, and that would bring about greater delay than if the legislatures themselves were authorized to consider it.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield so that I may ask a question of my colleague?

Mr. WILEY. I yield to the junior Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. COOPER. If ratification is permitted by legislatures, is it not true that members of legislatures now in session who were elected last year were elected at a time when this issue could not have been acted upon by the people? To that extent the people could not ratify this amendment.

Mr. BARKLEY. That would be true of legislatures which were still in session at the time the amendment was submitted. I think there would be very few legislatures in session. Most of them have been in session since the 1st of January. I doubt very much if by the time this amendment could be submitted and certified to the legislatures for their action, many of them would be still in session. Those that were still in session could take action. It is true that they were elected at a time when this amendment was not in issue. That argument would have vitiated all amendments to the Constitution except one, because they were all submitted to legislatures. Some members were elected afterward; some of the legislatures were in session at the time, but the members of many of them had been previously elected. So an amendment cannot be submitted to legislatures in which there would not be some legislators who would act upon it who had been chosen prior to the submission of the amendment.

Mr. REVERCOMB. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WILEY. I yield to the Senator from West Virginia.

Mr. REVERCOMB. This discussion has been very interesting. We continue to discuss in the Senate whether the ratification shall be by conventions or by legislatures, when, as a matter of fact, however we submit the question to the States, whether we say the amendment shall be ratified by conventions or by legislatures, the legislatures of the States will determine it. With all due respect to the views stated, we are debating a question which I feed is somewhat moot, because if we say we are going to submit the amendment to the States to be ratified by conventions, the State legislatures may resolve themselves into conventions then and there.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. REVERCOMB. Just a moment, please. In any event, a legislature may say, "We want to act on this matter by a convention." So in the last analysis our discussion here cannot resolve the question whether ratification shall be by legislatures or by conventions, because the legislatures will determine that question.

The able Senator from Washington [Mr. MAGNUSON] has brought home to us a very definite case in which he himself took part as a member of the legislature. In acting upon the eighteenth amendment, the legislature of his State resolved itself into a convention and acted as a convention. That amendment specified that it was to be ratified by conventions.

So I get back to the point that there is nothing to be gained by this debate upon the floor of the Senate as to which method shall be used, because in the last analysis, and in essence and finality, the legislatures of the States will say how they shall act, whether they themselves shall act as conventions or select others to act for them.

Mr. BARKLEY. I cannot agree with the Senator from West Virginia that it is a moot question as to whether we submit the amendment to State legislatures or to conventions provided by the State legislatures. It may be that in some State the legislature might seek to circumvent the intention of the Congress by resolving itself into a convention, but I think it would be a very rare legislature that would do that.

Mr. REVERCOMB. What about the Legislature of the State of Washington?

Mr. MAGNUSON. Mr. President, I wish to correct an erroneous impression. I said that we had a convention for a specific purpose. The legislature acted.

Mr. BARKLEY. But the legislature did not resolve itself into a convention.

Mr. MAGNUSON. No.

Mr. REVERCOMB. Then I misunderstood.

Mr. DONNELL and other Senators addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. WILEY. I yield first to the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. DONNELL. Mr. President, I should like to ask a question of the Senator from Kentucky: Does he not believe there is very great doubt as to the right of a legislature to resolve itself into a convention?

Mr. BARKLEY. I very seriously doubt it.

Mr. DONNELL. Mr. President, I should like to be heard on that subject because I, too, seriously doubt it.

Mr. BARKLEY. If a legislature attempted to do so, it would nullify the action of the Congress in declaring that conventions should be called.

Mr. DONNELL. Mr. President, I endorse what has been stated by the Senator from Kentucky. In fact, I would say, furthermore, that undoubtedly it would circumvent the very clear distinction, presented by article V of the Constitution, between ratification by legislatures and ratification by conventions, because that article provides for the validity of an amendment "when ratified by the legislatures of three-fourths of the several States, or by conventions in three-fourths thereof, as the one or the other mode of ratification may be proposed by the Congress."

If the legislature of a State can resolve itself into a convention, obviously, it seems to me, it would thus directly undertake to nullify the clear distinction stated in the constitutional provision to which I have referred.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. WILEY. I yield.

Mr. GEORGE. I merely wish to suggest that one very practical question involved is that, if this joint resolution is passed, it will be necessary to obtain a two-thirds majority in the Congress, and all the votes which can be obtained will be needed. I think it is perfectly obvious that the notion of a convention is merely theoretical at best, and that the safest and clearest way is to submit the amendment to the legislatures of the several States.

Mr. MAGNUSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. WILEY. I yield.

Mr. MAGNUSON. I think there has been a great deal of misunderstanding about substituting conventions for the State legislatures. I do not know how all States handle such matters or handle such conventions. I do know about the procedure in my own State and in three others. The State legislature acts, and then the people of the State vote on the specific issue in choosing delegates to represent them on it. A person who runs for election as a delegate to the State constitutional convention will say whether he is for or against the proposed constitutional amendment. The conventions therefore are perfunctory, because no one can influence the delegates; each delegate is committed when he goes to the convention. Such conventions are not like political conventions.

Mr. President, we thought this way was the best way to take the issue to the people. After all, the members of the State legislatures are elected for many reasons. In my own State the members of the State senate were elected last fall, for a term of 4 years, and in the election held at that time the proposed constitutional amendment now under discussion was not an issue. Consequently, that legislature can act on this matter without ever knowing how the people of the State feel about it.

So we thought this way would be the best way; and the founding fathers thought so, too. Regardless of how many voters take part in electing delegates to such a convention, at least we shall know how many of the citizens vote "yes" and how many vote "no" on this question.

After all, Mr. President, candidates for election to State legislatures run for various reasons. Of course, many State legislatures can resolve themselves into State conventions. As a matter of fact, in many States the candidates run from legislative districts.

So, Mr. President, there is nothing wrong with the method here proposed. The conventions thus provided for cannot be raped. As a matter of fact, as I have said, these conventions are merely perfunctory, and the issue is clear. The way we have proposed is the quickest way to bring the issue to the people. I voted for this measure in the committee, and I shall vote for it in the Senate; but I think the people of my State have a right to pass upon it, and to do so in the most democratic way.

In some States the legislatures are controlled in one way or another. Sometimes they are controlled by the big interests. But if a legislature calls a convention for this purpose, at least the people will have a right to vote on the question, and thus to express their views regarding it.

I am frank to say I do not know how many votes are likely to be cast at such a time. Perhaps there will be only a sprinkling of votes. But whoever exercises his duty of citizenship in voting on this issue will have an opportunity to vote either "Yes" or "No," and the delegates who are selected to go to such conventions will be bound to vote in accordance with the views of the citizens who have elected them.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, let me inquire whether the Senator from Washington thinks that "big interests" which could control a legislature—which means they would have elected the legislature—would be any less likely to control such a convention.

Mr. MAGNUSON. The convention could not be touched. The election is what they would have to control.

Mr. BARKLEY. But the process by which an election could be touched would be identical to the one by which a convention could be touched.

Mr. MAGNUSON. That is true; but if a convention is called, at least the people will have a right to vote their views on the matter. In my State, State senators are elected for a term of 4 years, and the entire State senate was elected last fall. So, if the legislature acts on this question, the people of the State will not have a chance to vote on it.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WILEY. I yield.

Mr. LUCAS. I merely wish to correct a misapprehension about how delegates are selected. I undertake to say that the legislature does not have to provide candidates shall be either for or against such an amendment. A delegate can be elected to a convention of this kind without being committed in advance as to how he shall vote.

Mr. MAGNUSON. I understand; and I say I do not know how the matter is handled in all the other States. But the way I have outlined is the way it is handled in my State.

Mr. DONNELL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. WILEY. I yield.

Mr. DONNELL. I desire to make a few remarks, in addition to directing a brief inquiry to the Senator from Wisconsin; and I ask unanimous consent that I may do so.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Wisconsin cannot hold the floor indefinitely.

Mr. WILEY. I have not held the floor indefinitely thus far, Mr. President; but I am perfectly willing to take my seat at this time, and I do so.

Mr. DONNELL. Mr. President, do I have the floor?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Missouri has the floor.

Mr. DONNELL. Mr. President, several very interesting questions have been presented in the last few minutes. I should like to refer briefly to a question suggested by the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. REVERCOMB], namely, whether it is necessary for Congress to prescribe the machinery for the selection of a convention.

Mr. REVERCOMB. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. DONNELL. I yield.

Mr. REVERCOMB. I did not intend to convey the idea that it is necessary to select one or the other procedure. Is that the point the Senator had in mind?

Mr. DONNELL. No. I understood that inquiry had been made of the Senator from West Virginia, which he in turn addressed to the Senator from Wisconsin, as to whether it is necessary for Congress to prescribe the machinery for the selection of delegates to State conventions called for the purpose of ratifying proposed constitutional amendments. Am I correct in my interpretation of the Senator's remarks?

Mr. REVERCOMB. Yes; that is the inquiry I made, and I shall be very glad to hear the Senator from Missouri discuss that subject.

Mr. DONNELL. Mr. President, I should like to say that the question thus presented is very interesting, and it seems to me that even though we look into the matter rather hastily, it is still worth while for the RECORD to show the results of one or two great adjudications upon it.

It may be pointed out that in 1933, in my own State of Missouri, a convention was provided for and called, as I understand, to pass upon the twenty-first amendment. In that case certain litigation ensued, leading to the decision of State ex rel. Tate against Sevier, to be found in 333 Missouri 662. I quote the following language from pages 667 and 668 of that decision:

> Our State constitution does not authorize the legislature to set up the machinery by which a convention may be assembled to ratify or reject an amendment to the Federal Constitution. That authority emanates from the Federal Constitution. Article V thereof provides that the Congress shall determine whether ratification shall be by conventions in the several States, or by the legislatures thereof. When the Congress proposes an amendment for ratification by conventions, although it does not provide how and by whom such conventions shall be assembled, its direction that the ratification shall be by conventions, necessarily implies authority to provide for the assembling of such conventions. (5) It therefore follows that when the legislature enacted House Bill 514 which provides the method for assembling a convention, it was not, strictly speaking, performing the functions of a legislative body for the State, but was acting as a representative of the people, pursuant to authority delegated to it by the Federal Constitution to provide a method for obtaining and assembling conventions to represent the people in ratifying or rejecting proposed amendments to the Federal Constitution.

So, Mr. President, I submit that at least the Supreme Court of Missouri has taken the view that it is not necessary for Congress to enact the details for the selection of the delegates to a convention.

I call attention also to the fact that that court cited another case from another jurisdiction, namely, the case of Donnelly v. Myers, Secretary of State (186 Northeastern 918), decided by the Supreme Court of Ohio on July 12, 1933. With the permission of the Senate I read the following from the decision of the Supreme Court of Missouri with respect to the Ohio case. Says the Supreme Court of Missouri at page 668 of 333 Missouri:

> The facts of that case—

That is to say, the Ohio case—

> show that after the Seventy-second Congress proposed an amendment to the Federal Constitution repealing the eighteenth amendment, the General Assembly of Ohio enacted Senate bill No. 204 setting up the machinery for the calling of a convention to pass upon amendments to the Federal Constitution. Thereafter on June 21, 1933, a petition purporting to be signed by the requisite number of persons seeking a referendum on Senate bill No. 204 was filed with the secretary of state. A suit was brought to prohibit the secretary of state from submitting the question to a vote of the people. The question thus presented to the Supreme Court of Ohio is the exact question which is presented in the case at bar. In denying the right to a referendum the Supreme Court of Ohio said—

Then follows the quotation to which I refer:

> Under the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States in Hawke v. Smith, Secretary of State (253 U. S. 221), there can be no referendum upon the decision of a State legislature to ratify or to reject a proposed amendment to the Federal Constitution.

Then I proceed to the further quotation from the Ohio court:

> In our opinion, however, the calling of such convention is but a step necessary and incidental to the final action of the convention in registering the voice of a State upon the amendment proposed by the Congress. The action of the Legislature in performing this function rests upon the authority of article V of the Constitution of the United States. It is a Federal function, which in the absence of action by the Congress, the State legislature is authorized to perform.

Citing Lesser v. Garnett (258 U. S. 137), Smiley v. Holm (285 U. S. 355).

So, Mr. President, I undertake to say that the decision of the Supreme Court of Missouri and that of the Supreme Court of Ohio indicate very clearly that it is not necessary for Congress to enact the details of the machinery for the selection of delegates to a convention.

I observe also in the annotations of the United States Code, annotated, with respect to article V of the Constitution, this language:

> Convention to ratify or reject proposed amendments to Federal Constitution must come into being pursuant to State law which must be duly enacted pursuant to State constitutions.

Citing Opinions of the Justices, 1933, 148 Southern 107, 226 Alabama 565, which would appear to bear out the same view taken by the Missouri and Ohio courts.

Mr. President, the second point which was presented a little while ago was as to whether or not a legislature can itself act as a convention; that is to say, if we adopt the pending joint resolution providing for a convention, can the legislatures of the respective States resolve themselves into conventions?

I have not taken the opportunity to look into the precedents on this point, and I do not know whether or not any State legislatures have taken the view that they can do so; but I desire to emphasize, in a very few sentences, both the remarks of the distinguished Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY], the minority leader, and the remarks which I made a few moments ago, to the general effect that it would seem perfectly clear that under article V of the Constitution it was the intention of the framers of the Constitution either that the legislatures shall be the ratifying bodies, or that conventions shall be the ratifying bodies.

It appears to me, therefore, Mr. President, by the language which I read a few moments ago from that article, that if any legislature should resolve itself into a convention it would be a clear nullification of the intention of article V.

Whether or not such action would be subject to collateral attack, whether or not it has ever been done by any legislature, I do not know; but I desire at this moment to place in the RECORD the position, as clearly as I can, to the effect that no legislature has the moral or the legal right to resolve itself into a convention to pass upon such an amendment.

Mr. REVERCOMB. Mr. President, will the Senator from Missouri yield?

Mr. DONNELL. I yield to the Senator from West Virginia.

Mr. REVERCOMB. The Senator has expounded the view that all matters of machinery and the arrangements for the convention are within the unlimited powers of the State legislatures. If the State legislatures have the power to set up the machinery of holding a convention, let us say, what is to limit their power to say that "the members of this legislature shall be the delegates to the convention?"

Let me address a further question to the able Senator. The legislatures fix the method of the selection of the delegates, they say how many delegates there shall be, what units of territory are included within the representation of the delegates—all those things are fixed by the legislature. There is no limit upon it. What, then, is there to prevent the legislature from saying, as a matter of saving expense to the people, "We have been elected by the people, we discussed this in an election, therefore we say that the members of the legislature shall be the delegates to the convention?" What is there to prevent that?

Mr. DONNELL. Mr. President, the answer is twofold. In the first place, article VI of the Constitution reads in part as follows:

> This Constitution, and the laws of the United States which shall be made in pursuance thereof; and all treaties made, or which shall be made, under the authority of the United States, shall be the supreme law of the land.

That is one point. The further point is that just as the Constitution has provided that it and the Federal laws and treaties shall be the supreme law of the land, it then follows that we should look into the Constitution to see whether or not there is any prohibition against the legislatures doing what the distinguished Senator from West Virginia mentions, namely, the setting up of themselves as conventions.

In that connection, I reiterate that article V clearly, it seems to me, contemplates that the legislatures have no power to do so, because article V distinctly discriminates between legislatures on the one hand and conventions on the other. If article V can be construed to authorize the legislatures to constitute themselves into conventions, then the legislatures have it within their power utterly to wipe out and ignore the very distinction and discrimination drawn by the Constitution, which latter instrument is, as indicated before, under article VI, among the instruments which constitute the supreme law of the land. That is my answer to the question.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DONNELL. I shall yield, unless the Senator from West Virginia desires to further interrogate me.

Mr. REVERCOMB. Just one or two observations.

Mr. DONNELL. I shall be glad to yield to the Senator from Texas as soon as the Senator from West Virginia shall conclude.

Mr. REVERCOMB. I was very much interested in the line of argument made to the effect that if the legislature made a condition that members of the legislature should be the delegates to the convention, it would defeat——

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. President, until the acoustics of the Senate Chamber are improved, Senators on the other side who desire to have their colleagues hear what they say will have to speak a little louder. Will not the Senator from West Virginia speak louder?

Mr. REVERCOMB. Very well. The argument has been made that if the legislatures of the States should provide that the members of the legislatures should be the delegates to conventions to consider the ratification of an amendment to the Constitution, that would defeat the provisions of the Constitution, and that the same State legislators would not in fact, under such a decision, be a convention. Does the Senator go so far as to say that if delegates running before the people for election to the legislature should advocate that course, and the same persons should be selected as delegates to a convention and also as members constituting the legislature, that would be a violation?

Mr. DONNELL. Mr. President, my answer is "No," if the members of the electorate of a State were privileged to vote for those individuals, both as members of the legislature and as members of the convention. But I undertake to say that even though every member of the legislature should run for the legislature upon a plank providing what he would do or what he would not do with respect to an amendment, there is no moral or legal or constitutional right for such legislature to resolve itself into a convention. Article V of the Constitution clearly and obviously distinguishes between the two, and expresses the intent of the framers of the Constitution, that the choice must be made between the legislature on the one hand and the convention on the other.

Now I yield to the Senator from Texas.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, I congratulate the Senator from Missouri. I think he is sound in the argument he has just made. I merely wish to make a suggestion, in answer to the Senator from West Virginia, as to what the remedy will be. If the State legislature should assume to convert itself into a convention, the Federal Government could reject its action and say you have not done this in the way that is prescribed, which was by convention. Its vote would not count when the certification came to Washington to be filed with the Secretary of State. He would reject it. I think that is one answer.

Mr. DONNELL. Mr. President, I appreciate the suggestion by the Senator. As I indicated a few moments ago, I do not know whether an attack, collateral, or whatever it may be, could be made upon the action of a State legislature, whether there would come into play some sort of theory that there was a political action with which the Supreme Court of the United States would not interfere. I am not saying what the ultimate decision would be, but I thoroughly agree with the soundness of the principle suggested by the distinguished Senator from Texas, and it would seem to me that obviously if the Legislature of the State of Missouri or Iowa, or any other State, were to resolve itself into a convention, and the action of such so-called convention were then to be certified to Washington, a test could be made upon a mandamus suit directed against the proper official here, directing him either to file or not file the instrument so presented.

As one Member of the Senate, I want to reiterate most strongly that to my mind any legislature which undertakes to resolve itself into a convention is violating the Constitution, to wit, article V.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DONNELL. I yield to the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. BARKLEY. If one State could do that, all 48 States could do it.

Mr. DONNELL. Precisely.

Mr. BARKLEY. It certainly would go to the validity of the action of all of them in ratifying, if they did ratify this amendment.

Mr. DONNELL. I thank the Senator and concur with him.

I hasten on because I realize the lateness of the hour, and I want to say a word, as a third proposition, on the question that we have been debating—as to whether the action of ratification should be taken by conventions or should be taken by legislatures.

It happens to be my very highly esteemed privilege to be a member of the Committee on the Judiciary of the United States Senate, and I want to say, along the line of the remarks of our distinguished chairman, the Senator from Wisconsin, that I have found the members of that committee to have individual minds, expressive of individual opinions, though they have shown a fine spirit of cooperation in the attempt to resolve their various differences along reasonable and proper lines.

I was one of those who at first glance took the position, in my own mind, that the method of proceeding before legislatures was the proper method. I was somewhat firmly entrenched in that view, I thought, by reason of the fact that I found that in every instance ratification of a constitutional amendment had been accomplished by the legislatures of the States, with the single exception of the twenty-first amendment. But, Mr. President, on further consideration, after the very strong presentation, as I recall it, by the distinguished Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. McGRATH], upon the proposition that there is an advantage in action by convention, I came to the conclusion that there is. My position upon that matter is simply this: As has been so well stated by other Senators this afternoon, when men are elected to a convention upon the specific issue of being in favor of or opposing the amendment, then a convention has been selected, not to pass upon some road question, not to pass upon the support of the penitentiary, not to pass upon the numerous local questions which always enter into the equation when men are candidates for the legislature, but there is action by a body which was chosen for one specific purpose, a body upon which the full force of publicity can be centered, a body which has the responsibility which every citizen in the State has the right, at any rate, to know is going to be observed by that convention.

I was greatly impressed with the suggestion made by the distinguished junior Senator from Kentucky, upon my own side of the aisle, and I hope that he will not feel that this is in any sense flattery, and I hope that no other Senator will so regard it. I want to say that our distinguished minority leader has given to this body a fine example of leadership in the past and at the present, and I want to say that, in my judgment, he is to be congratulated, as well as the State of Kentucky and the Senate, upon the fact that he has a colleague of the capacity and the integrity and stamina of the distinguished junior Senator from Kentucky. I have worked with him in the Judiciary Committee, and I think I know whereof I speak. I was digressing, but I think, in justice to him, it is well for the Senate to know something of the hard, conscientious work which the junior Senator from Kentucky has been doing in the Judiciary Committee of this body.

I was impressed with his point, namely, that members who have been already elected to the legislature of his or of other States this year, and are now serving in the legislatures, would, if the legislatures were to be permitted to pass upon this problem, vote upon the amendment, perhaps decide whether the amendment should be adopted or should be defeated, and yet not a single one of them was elected upon the issue as to whether this amendment should or should not be ratified.

I appreciate the fact, Mr. President, that there may be some delay involved in securing action upon this amendment if it be submitted to conventions for ratification. I am aware of that fact, but, on the other hand, I realize that we have lived for a good many years under the existing provisions. To my mind, it is no criticism of the convention method to suggest that it may afford opportunity for further and adequate consideration by the country, even though it results in some cooling off in the process of consideration, even though it involve some delay in the consideration of and action upon the amendment.

Mr. President, to my mind we have a choice between submitting this amendment to bodies and individuals throughout the 48 States who have not been selected, and who will not be selected upon the issue of whether this amendment should or should not be ratified; we have the opportunity, I say, of choosing between that alternative on the one hand, or, on the other hand, of choosing a method by which every man who votes upon the proposition will have been elected by reason of the fact that the people knew that he stood for or against, or at least that he had the opportunity to be catechised upon that question by the people before he was elected to the convention.

So, Mr. President, in closing, I submit three propositions:

First, it is not necessary for Congress to prescribe the machinery for the selection of conventions. The cases which I have mentioned, I think, amply substantiate that point.

In the second place, to my mind the legislatures have no moral or legal right to constitute themselves into conventions; and

In the third place, the proper, the appropriate, and the wise plan for the handling of this matter should be through the method of the choice by conventions, as I finally came to believe after hearing the splendid arguments of the Senator from Rhode Island and doubtless other members of our committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the first committee amendment.

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, in view of the lateness of the hour, and in view of the fact that many of the Senators have gone home, I desire to propose a unanimous-consent request. First, I ask that at not later than 12:30 Monday a vote be taken on the pending amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Wisconsin that on Monday, at not later than 12:30 o'clock, the Senate shall vote on the first committee amendment?

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, I have occasion to know that there are Senators on this side of the aisle who would object to any unanimous-consent request fixing a definite time for voting. Under those circumstances, I feel I must object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection is heard.

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, there has been much newspaper criticism with respect to inaction by Congress. I think everything has been said that could be said pro and con in relation to the pending constitutional amendment. My purpose in submitting the request was to try to facilitate action on the joint resolution. I intended to follow it up by the request, which I shall now make, that not later than 5 o'clock on Monday next the Senate shall vote on all amendments to the joint resolution and on the joint resolution itself.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Wisconsin submits the unanimous-consent request that on Monday, at not later than 5 o'clock, the Senate shall vote upon all amendments to the pending joint resolution and upon the joint resolution itself. Under the rule a quorum call is necessary before that request can be agreed to.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President, every consideration which led me to object to the previous request applies in the present instance. I understand the Chair to be correct in his statement that there must be a quorum call before action can be taken on the request, and it does not seem to me that we ought to proceed to that extremity at this time. I object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection is heard.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, I should like to address myself to the Senator from Wisconsin. While both requests which he made were agreeable to me, I can appreciate the reasons why the Senator from Maine feels called upon to object. I think the chances are very great that we will be able to conclude consideration of all the amendments and the joint resolution itself on Monday regardless of the absence of any agreement. I shall cooperate to that end to the extent of my ability. I do not know how many other Senators want to address the Senate on the main proposal. I myself wish briefly to discuss it. I know of two or three other Senators who also wish to do so. But I see no reason why we cannot conclude action on Monday.

Mr. WILEY. I thank the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. MAGNUSON. Mr. President, I submit an amendment to the pending joint resolution and ask that it be printed. I shall not ask for its consideration at this time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment offered by the Senator from Washington to the joint resolution will be printed and lie on the table.

SENATE

MONDAY, MARCH 10, 1947

(Legislative day of Wednesday, February 19, 1947)

The Senate met at 12 o'clock meridian, on the expiration of the recess.

The Chaplain, Rev. Peter Marshall, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Our Father, as we come into Thy presence this morning, we are saddened by the announcement of the great loss and bereavement sustained by one of the most distinguished Members of this body. Our sympathy goes out to him, deep and tender, as we stand at his side sharing his sorrow as far as friends may and joining our prayers that he may feel even now the everlasting arms upholding him and Thy grace and Thy love sustaining him in this dark hour.

We give Thee thanks for his constant devotion, for the courage and the fidelity to duty that has marked these last years when he was called upon by Thy strange and mysterious providence to walk a hard road; and we give Thee thanks for the beauty and inspiration that his helpmeet provided in the difficult experiences they shared together.

We thank Thee for her charm and for the winsome beauty of her life and spirit, and we pray that Thy grace may be sufficient now for him who was her partner and for the members of the family who mourn her going.

We thank Thee for the hope Thou hast given us that there will come a day when the lost chords of life may be found again in that happy land, and all that is dark and mysterious now shall be revealed and its purposes made plain.

We pray that in this great sorrow, shared by each Member of this body, we may be drawn closer to each other in true comradeship and fellowship. May sympathy unite our hearts to each other, and bind us to Thee, who dost mark our tears and hast promised to wipe them away.

So may Thy blessing be upon our brother now and upon all who are with him in the fraternity of sorrow, that their faith may be strengthened and their hope made bright and triumphant. Through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

MESSAGES FROM THE PRESIDENT—APPROVAL OF BILL

Messages in writing from the President of the United States were communicated to the Senate by Mr. Miller, one of his secretaries, and he announced that on March 7, 1947, the President had approved and signed the act (S. 234) to authorize the Secretary of the Navy to convey to the Central of Georgia Railway Co. an easement for railway purposes in certain Government-owned lands situated in Bibb County, Ga.

TRIBUTES TO MRS. ALBEN W. BARKLEY

Mr. COOPER. Mr. President and Members of the Senate, it was with deep regret that I learned, just a little while ago, of the death this morning of the wife of the distinguished senior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY]. I am aware that no eulogy of her is necessary to those who knew her, and I realize that little can be said in sympathy which can be helpful. I should like to say, however, that throughout the years the people of her native State, Kentucky, have held in affection and respect the wife of our distinguished colleague. They have known the strong and beautiful qualities of her character and intellect, her devotion and helpfulness to her husband, and their respect and affection have been deepened by the knowledge of her long and patient suffering.

They have known, also, of his selflessness and devotion to her. And so today, in a very inadequate manner, I desire to express my own sorrow and the sorrow of the people of my State upon the death of Mrs. Barkley, and to extend to our colleague, Senator BARKLEY, deep and heartfelt sympathy.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, I wish to extend, in behalf of myself and Mrs. Morse, deep sympathy to the distinguished Senator from Kentucky [Mr.

BARKLEY] in this hour of sorrow. I am conscious of the great spiritual values which sustain him at this moment of bereavement.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, a large circle of friends is saddened today by the announcement of the death of Mrs. Alben Barkley at her home in this city. Mrs. Barkley had been a part of the life of the city of Washington for more than 30 years. During the days of her strength and good health she was constantly with her friends and enjoyed the respect and the love and admiration of a very large circle of men and women in public life and men and women from all sections of the United States. She possessed those peculiar womanly charms and the strength of character which made her the center of a beautiful and delightful home.

Her husband, who served for a long period of years in the National House of Representatives, and who served as majority leader of this body for a longer period of time than any other man in the history of the Senate, and who is at the present time the minority leader, was constantly weighted with the care of his own responsibilities as well as the illness of the wife who had meant so much to him in his home and in his life. Mrs. Barkley had been indeed a tower of strength to the distinguished senior Senator from Kentucky.

Those of us who knew Senator BARKLEY well throughout the years, and who had the opportunity to observe him and who knew with what fidelity he met his responsibilities as majority leader and as a Member of the Senate, often wondered how he managed to do so in view of the long-continued illness of the wife to whom he was so sincerely devoted. There was a strong tie of affectionate love between Senator BARKLEY and his wife.

She was not only a popular woman here in Washington, but in her own native State of Kentucky as well. Those of us who have served here with Senator BARKLEY and those who have had the privilege of knowing Mrs. Barkley through the years have the deepest sympathy for the bereaved family, and for the Senator himself, on whom the loss falls with peculiar force.

Mr. President, a woman who rears a delightful family, who is the center of honor within the family group, and who through a long life retains the affection and deepest respect of a good husband has not lived in vain. The passing of Mrs. Barkley today not only has saddened a large circle of friends here and elsewhere, but has brought keenly to our minds and to our imagination the burdens under which the distinguished Senator from Kentucky has labored in this body during the years of her protracted illness.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, I am most happy that the senior Senator from Georgia should have made this most appropriate and eloquent address dealing with the passing of Mrs. Alben W. Barkley.

When I first became a Member of the House of Representatives—it will soon be 30 years ago—in company with the Senator from Maine [Mr. WHITE], who entered that body on the same day I entered it, I became acquainted with Senator BARKLEY, then a Member of the House, and shortly thereafter I became acquainted with Mrs. Barkley. Mr. President, our families were very intimate for a great number of years. I learned to know Mrs. Barkley and found her to be a gracious, intelligent, charming woman, possessed of all the graces and fine qualities which ornament noble womanhood. She was an inspiration to her husband in his public career and in his private life.

I happen to know that some years ago they purchased an old estate near Paducah, Ky., remodeled and refurnished it with all of the period furnishings which would revive its ancient splendor. They took great pride in providing a home back in Kentucky, their native State.

I am personally deeply grieved at the passing of Mrs. Barkley. I profoundly sympathize with Senator BARKLEY, because I know the great loss which he has suffered. I am sure that, as already suggested, Mrs. Barkley did not live in vain. She made a distinct contribution to the age in which she lived, and she ennobled and uplifted every circle in which she moved.

Mr. President, I shall not prolong these remarks, but I wished to say this much so that the record might bear testimony to my admiration for Mrs. Barkley and for the wonderful life she lived.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, it was with a sense of profound sorrow that I learned this morning of the passing of the wife of our esteemed minority leader, the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY]. Modest and retiring by nature, she was loved by all who knew her. Her devotion to her husband and family was a source of strength and inspiration which will be sorely missed. She pursued the arts of the home with grace, and brought dignity and character to the raising of a fine family which will always remain a tribute to her.

She was known and admired throughout the State of Kentucky for her kindness and character. When she came to Washington to be at her husband's side during his service in the Congress, she won the esteem and affection of all who were privileged to know her. Her married life extended over almost 44 years. The unmatched devotion of Senator BARKLEY and his wife to each other throughout their lives, and especially during the long illness of Mrs. Barkley, became a matter of public comment.

I do not suppose that any words of ours at this moment can serve to lessen the deep sorrow which has thus befallen our colleague and his family. We can only extend to them our deepest sympathy in this hour of their loss.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President, we on this side of the aisle—and I know it to be equally true of Senators on the other side—learned this morning with the keenest regret of the tragic loss suffered by our colleague the distinguished minority leader [Mr. BARKLEY].

For more than 40 years Mrs. Barkley has been an affectionate mother, a loving and helpful wife, a companion in fellowship with the Senator from Kentucky in the trials and vicissitudes, as well as the triumphs, of his long and honorable public career. Through the years Mrs. Barkley has won the hearts and the enduring respect of all who have been privileged to know her. To our colleague goes the assurance of a sympathy which we feel in full measure, but which we can express but inadequately. There goes to him assurance of our respect and affection as he meets with courage and faith this great affliction visited on him.

Mr. BROOKS. Mr. President, it was not my privilege to know Mrs. Barkley. It has been my privilege to know her husband. Knowing Mrs. Barkley through those who have spoken so kindly of her, it seems to me that she typifies those wonderful women who have come to the Capital of the greatest country on earth, and sometimes humbly, and many times quite unknown, carried the burden of the heart and the work of their husbands. I wish to pay my tribute to this lady whom I did not know, and express my deep and sincere sympathy to her distinguished husband.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE

Mr. CAIN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to be absent from the Senate on Wednesday of this week.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the leave is granted.

ROBERT MONTGOMERY

Mr. TOBEY. Mr. President, I take just 30 seconds to point out that in the recent war remarkably fine service was rendered by some of those engaged in the great professions of our country. There is in the gallery to my right one who rendered valiant and distinguished service in our naval forces in the war, the movie actor, Robert Montgomery. I point this out for the edification and interest of my colleagues. A tribute to whom tribute is due.

By the PRESIDENT pro tempore:

A joint resolution of the Legislature of the State of Wisconsin; to the Committee on Banking and Currency:

"Senate Joint Resolution 13

"Joint resolution memorializing the Congress of the United States to remove all controls upon the production and sale of sugar

"Whereas sugar is one of the most important food items used in the American home and without it housewives are seriously hampered in supplying their families with a properly balanced diet; and

"Whereas the lack of sugar for canning during the past season caused housewives to curtail their fruit and vegetable canning, thereby causing great quantities of Wisconsin grown fruit and vegetables to go to waste which would otherwise have been preserved for winter use by canning; and

"Whereas there is every reason to believe that this waste of Wisconsin fruit and vegetables will be repeated during the coming growing season if the present system of sugar controls is continued; and

"Whereas labor in the food processing industry has been thrown out of work and the producers of fruits and vegetables have suffered great financial loss because of the sugar shortage; and

"Whereas in 1946 the sugar under the direct control of the United States increased by more than one-half million tons and no portion of this increase was made available to the American people; and

"Whereas black-market operators in sugar have flourished and grown rich during the period of sugar rationing and will continue to aggrandize themselves at the expense of the general public so long as controls on the production, sale, and consumption of sugar are continued: Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved by the senate (the assembly concurring), That the Congress of the United States is respectfully requested to provide by law for an immediate decontrol of sugar for home consumption and for industrial use; and be it further

"Resolved, That Congress is respectfully requested to remove all controls from the production, distribution, rationing, sale, and importation of sugar; and be it further

"Resolved, That duly attested copies of this resolution be immediately transmitted to the clerks of both Houses of the Congress of the United States and to each Member of the Congress from this State."

A joint memorial of the Legislature of the State of Wyoming, memorializing Congress to strengthen the present sanitary requirements governing the importation of livestock from the Republic of Mexico; to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

(See joint memorial printed in full when presented by Mr. O'MAHONEY on March 7, 1947, p. 1762, CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.)

A joint memorial of the Legislature of the State of Wyoming, memorializing the Congress to enact legislation relating to employers' sinking funds and reserves and taxability thereof; to the Committee on Finance.

(See joint memorial printed in full when presented by Mr. O'MAHONEY on March 7, 1947, p. 1762, CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.)

A resolution adopted by the Louisiana Legislative Committee on Educational Survey, Baton Rouge, La., praying for the enactment of the bill (S. 472) to authorize the appropriation of funds to assist the States and Territories in financing a minimum foundation education program of public elementary and secondary schools, and in reducing the inequalities of educational opportunities through public elementary and secondary schools, for the general welfare, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare.

A letter in the nature of a petition from the United Home Owners of Illinois, Chicago, Ill., praying for the enactment of legislation to abolish rent controls; to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

By Mr. DWORSHAK:

A joint memorial of the Legislature of the State of Idaho; to the Committee on Public Lands:

"Senate Joint Memorial 3

"Joint memorial to the President and the Congress of the United States of America in opposition to the policy of the Secretary of the Department of the Interior, Mr. J. A. Krug, as announced on February 2, 1947, accompanying his first annual report, of keeping all federally owned mineral lands in permanent Federal ownership, permitting development only under leasing laws, and that the present mining laws which permit the patenting of mineral lands should be repealed

"Whereas because of a number of circumstances continuing since the early 1930's and up to the beginning of World War II, such as low metal prices and restrictive legislation bearing most heavily upon the mining industry, the development of old mines languished and few new mines were discovered. Not the least amongst these hindrances to prospecting and exploration for new sources of metals has been the policy of the Department of the Interior which has practically made it impossible to acquire title to mineral lands, thus thwarting the intent of Congress and the interpretations of the courts; and

"Whereas the mining industry, as well as all other industries of this country, made every effort to produce the utmost for the needs of war and handicapped as they were by a shortage of man power, it became necessary to concentrate on production of ore and sacrifice the development of additional areas to replace those which had been extracted; and

"Whereas we now find because of this series of circumstances that the normal ore reserves of this country have been depleted to a very considerable degree and by various means of propaganda this thought that our ore reserves have approached complete exhaustior has largely been promulgated by various bureaus under the Department of the Interior: Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved by the Senate and the House of Representatives of the State of Idaho (the Governor concurring therein), That we bitterly reject and condemn what appears to us to be a subtle conspiracy of the Department of the Interior, and of which this gaining absolute autocratic control of the mineral resources is but the entering wedge, as a theory utterly foreign to the philosophy of the Government of this country. To those whom we address, we respectfully call attention to the fact that despite the acknowledged scholastic abilities and integrity of members of the United States Geological Survey and the Bureau of Mines, and the years of effort and the millions of money spent by these departments, the mineral resources of this country have been discovered and developed by the adventurous resident population of these Western States and the function of these departments has been largely a compilation of the history of these undertakings. We believe a lease law covering all the multitudinous variations of ore deposits is a thing impossible of accomplishment; that it will result in flagrant abuses and concentration of power and rather than adding to our reserves of mineral resources will have exactly the contrary effect. The proposal of Secretary Krug to spend a billion dollars in taking an inventory of our mineral resources appears to be but a repetition of the way these departments operate. The compilation of data is not nearly so important as the finding of ore; the mining companies of Idaho and all the Western States are spending large sums of money for exploration and development with hope of finding new ore bodies to insure the Nation's metal requirements. The expenditure of such vast sums by men of energy, experience and ability in finding and developing new deposits will largely correct our present shortages. These companies could hardly be expected to spend millions in the development of new ground unless they could obtain title to these grounds if ore bodies should be developed. Leasing system as proposed would kill all prospecting. The title to mining claims must be granted to promote good sound business in mining. We feel the expenditure of such a sum of $1,000,000,000 by the Department of the Interior to write the obituary of the mining industry is somewhat amusing if it were not so tragic; be it further

"Resolved, That the Secretary of the State of Idaho be hereby authorized and directed to send copies of this joint memorial to Hon. Harry S. Truman, President of the United States; Hon. J. A. Krug, Secretary of the Interior; Hon. President of the Senate and Speaker of the House; Hon. Henry Dworshak, chairman of Mines and Mining; Hon. Edward V. Robertson, chairman, Public Lands Committee; Hon. Andrew L. Somers, chairman, House, Public Lands Committee; Hon. Hugh Butler, chairman, Public Lands Committee; and to the Senators and Representatives of Idaho in the two Houses of Congress."

A joint memorial of the Legislature of the State of Idaho; to the Committee on Finance:

"Senate Joint Memorial 4

"Joint memorial to the President and the Congress of the United States of America in opposition to the policy of the State Department to reduce tariffs on mineral products under the Trade Agreements Act

"Whereas because of the heavy depletion of mineral resources during the war years and the lack of new exploration for and discovery of mineral deposits for many years it is now recognized, as announced by the Secretary of the Interior Department, J. A. Krug, that search for new ore deposits and mines is of vital importance to the national welfare. The prospecting and exploration for new mineral deposits has been held back by lack of manpower during and since World War II, by low OPA metal ceilings and other restrictive Government legislation and also by the constant threat of tariff reductions under the Trade Agreements Act. Private industry is willing to take the gamble of spending large amounts of capital in mineral exploration if it can be guaranteed adequate tariff protection against the competition of lower labor costs and richer natural deposits in foreign countries when conditions in these countries return to normal; and

"Whereas there is a serious world shortage of many metals and with postwar demand far higher than prewar demand, this country will of necessity have to be more dependent on its own mineral resources. The metals produced in Idaho (antimony, copper, lead, mercury, tungsten, and zinc) are badly needed in both war and peace and the encouragement of the mining and the search for these metals is therefore in the national interest. One method of encouragement is by a real protective tariff; and

"Whereas the present threat of tariff cuts presents a serious problem to the mining industry. Due to the possibility of tariff concessions, the present tariffs on minerals no longer can be considered to offer any future protection. The development of new ore in old mines and the opening up of new mining enterprises call for long-term planning and large capital expenditures and with the lack of any guaranty as to future tariff protection, the incentive for mine development disappears completely in many cases. Mining is a big enough gamble, in itself, without in addition gambling on whether or not the State Department is going to cut tariffs; and

"Whereas the actual reduction in tariffs would not only discourage the search for and development of new mines, but would also shut down many mines that are now producing; and

"Whereas although it is argued that tariff concessions will remove trade barriers to imports and allow free access to the world's raw materials, it is a fact that most important metals can be shipped to this country without difficulty and sold here at world price plus duty. There are certain trade barriers on exports from this country, however. For example, the United States Government prohibits the export of antimony produced domestically; and

"Whereas in addition to harming the mining industry, tariff cuts which cause the shut-down of domestic mines could result in our country being at the mercy of foreign cartels which could then dictate their own terms as to quantities and prices of certain metals shipped to this country; and

"Whereas the development of new mining and smelting operations in this country not only contributes to the national security, but also creates new jobs and adds to the national wealth: Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved by the Senate and the House of Representatives of the State of Idaho (the Governor concurring therein), That we believe, from the standpoint of national security, special tariff consideration should be given to our mineral resources and that no further tariff reductions on mineral products should be made under the Trade Agreement Act; be it further

"Resolved, That the secretary of the State of Idaho be hereby authorized and directed to send copies of this joint memorial to Hon. Harry S. Truman, President of the United States; Hon. President of the Senate and Speaker of the House; Hon. Henry Dworshak, chairman of Mines and Mining Committee; Hon. Edward V. Robertson, chairman of Public Lands Committee; Hon. Andrew L. Somers, House Public Lands Committee; Hon. Hugh Butler, chairman of Public Lands Committee; F. Morton Leonard, Chief, Metals Division, United States Tariff Commission, Washington, D. C.; and to the Senators and Representatives of Idaho in the two Houses of Congress."

By Mr. GREEN (for himself and Mr. McGRATH):

A joint resolution of the Legislature of the State of Rhode Island; to the Committee on Public Lands:

"Joint resolution memorializing the Senators and Representatives from Rhode Island in the Congress of the United States with relation to the establishment of a national cemetery in the State of Rhode Island and Providence Plantations

"Resolved, That the Senators and Representatives from Rhode Island in the Congress of the United States be and they are hereby earnestly requested to use their best efforts to obtain acquiescence in the matter of the will of the General Assembly of the State of Rhode Island and Providence Plantations in its unanimous desire to have a national cemetery established in the State of Rhode Island and Providence Plantations for the interment of any veteran of any of the wars in which the United States has been or may in the future be engaged; and be it further

"Resolved, That the secretary of state is hereby authorized and directed to transmit duly certified copies of this resolution to His Excellency John O. Pastore, Governor of Rhode Island and to the Senators and Representatives from Rhode Island in the Congress of the United States."

A joint resolution of the Legislature of the State of Rhode Island; to the Committee on Finance:

"Resolution requesting the Senators and Representatives from Rhode Island in the Congress of the United States to use their good offices to secure prompt passage of the George bill, so-called, or a similar measure, to restore to the veterans of World War II the benefit rights to which they are justly entitled

"Whereas it is regrettable that Congress has failed to pass a bill to restore to veterans the social-security status they would have had if war had not interrupted their employment in insurable industry; and

"Whereas the Social Security Act should have been worded in such a way that service in the armed forces would not adversely affect the rights of workers, but it was not so worded; and

"Whereas time out for military service is not considered insurable employment and has prevented veterans from reaching a fully insured status; and

"Whereas this oversight is seriously affecting the benefit rights to which veterans, or their dependents, are by every right entitled; and

"Whereas legislation restoring to veterans the social-security credits which have been jeopardized by their military service should be enacted with the least possible delay; and

"Whereas there is now pending before the Congress of the United States a bill known as the George bill, which would protect the veterans prewar social-security credits and arbitrarily credit his account with an amount equal to that which he would have earned if he had spent his military service in an insurable employment; and

"Whereas the members of the Rhode Island General Assembly feel that the abovementioned bill, or a similar one, should be enacted with the least possible delay: Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved, That the Senators and Representatives from Rhode Island in the Congress of the United States are hereby requested to use their good offices to secure prompt passage of the now pending George bill, so-called, or a similar measure, to restore to veterans of World War II the benefit rights to which they are justly entitled; and be it further

"Resolved, That the secretary of state be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to transmit to the Senators and Representatives from Rhode Island in the Congress of the United States duly certified copies of this resolution."

By Mr. GEORGE:

A resolution of the Legislature of the State of Georgia; to the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare:

"Senate Resolution 24

"Whereas in initiating, supporting, and maintaining the national school lunch program, the Government of the United States has rendered invaluable aid to the cause of public education, from which the common school system of Georgia has enjoyed its full participation since this wise legislation was originally fostered and the benefits thereof first became available to the pupils in our public schools; and

"Whereas it is essential to the realization of Georgia's ambitious plans for the full development of its educational program and the adequate instruction of the children of our State, that these Federal grants which were so auspiciously launched and so successfully maintained during recent years, whereby nourishing food at lunch time may be available to the growing generation of America's future citizens, shall continue without interruption; and

"Whereas in the movement for retrenchment in national expenditures now so widely advocated, there is grave danger that this essential service shall be placed in jeopardy or sacrificed to the serious detriment of our educational interests: Therefore be it

"Resolved by the Senate of the State of Georgia (the House of Representatives concurring), That we hereby memorialize and urgently bespeak the favorable consideration of the Congress of the United States of suitable appropriations that will insure the continuance and maintenance of the national school lunch program upon substantially the same basis which has heretofore represented such an important contribution to the institution of public education as it has come to be recognized among the paramount obligations assumed by the public treasury; be it further

"Resolved, That copies hereof be transmitted at once to the Members of Georgia's delegation in the Senate and House of Representatives of the Congress of the United States."

ADMISSION OF JEWS INTO PALESTINE

Mr. GREEN. Mr. President, on behalf of my colleague the junior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. MCGRATH] and myself, I ask unanimous consent to present for appropriate reference and printing in the RECORD a resolution adopted by the City Council of the City of Providence, R. I., recommending the immediate admission of 100,000 European Jews into Palestine.

There being no objection, the resolution was received, referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Whereas the United States has already gone on record, by congressional resolution and Executive statement, as favoring the establishment, in Palestine, of an independent democratic Jewish commonwealth, as set forth in the Balfour Declaration; and

Whereas such a program has been heartily endorsed by both our great political parties in their last national convention platforms; and

Whereas the recent Anglo-American Commission recommended the immediate admission of 100,000 European Jews into Palestine, which recommendation is favored and approved by President Truman; and

Whereas there are hundreds of thousands of displaced persons in Europe, rapidly losing all hope for the future, of which about one-third are Jewish refugees seeking an opportunity to enter Palestine to start life there anew: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That this council, in recognition of the suffering endured by such refugees, and the need for some prompt action, does hereby memorialize, implore and entreat the Congress, its Members and the President, to take immediate steps to implement the report of said Commission; to act at once, by resolution, diplomatic channels or otherwise, in the name of justice and humanity to the end that the solemn declaration of the mandatory power be fulfilled, thus permitting the mass entrance of refugee Jews into Palestine and restoring peace in the Holy Land; and be it further

Resolved, That this resolution be spread upon the records, and that copies thereof be sent to the President of the United States and to the Rhode Island Members of the United States Senate and House of Representatives.

A true copy.

Attest:

[SEAL] D. EVERETT WHELAN,
City Clerk.

COMMEMORATION OF POLISH UPRISING IN 1863

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to present for printing in the RECORD a resolution which was adopted in Philadelphia on February 9 by a group of Americans of Polish descent, assembled at the Polish Home of Philadelphia, to commemorate the uprising of the Polish people against tyrants and oppressors in 1863.

I also ask unanimous consent that a letter written by me in reply to the resolution be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the resolution and letter were received and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

We, Americans of Polish descent, assembled at the Polish Home of Philadelphia, 211 Fairmount Avenue, Philadelphia, to commemorate the uprising of the Polish people against their tyrants and oppressors in 1863, on this day, Sunday, February 9, 1947, unanimously adopted the following resolution:

"Whereas the Moscow-engineered Polish elections were held under complete communistic control and were characterized by arrests, intimidations, terrorism, and murder; and

"Whereas the elections were a fraud and mockery and gone through as a pretense in order to propitiate the powers that believe in democracy and the rights of man; and

"Whereas from the notes exchanged with the Warsaw government and the principles enunciated therein, it is evident that our Government is aware of this sham and mockery of democratic principles and the dangers this entails; and

"Whereas these alleged elections clearly demonstrate the dangers and risks to those whose political beliefs are opposed to communistic principles and practices, and therefore the inability of the displaced persons to return to their native land.

"Now, therefore we, assembled here, appeal to and urge our Government to stand fast on the principles set forth in the Warsaw notes, to repudiate the fake elections and to withhold recognition of the counterfeit government imposed upon the Polish Nation by a foreign power; and we further urge that our Government in recognition of the principles of democracy and the rights of men, do its utmost that the despairing plight of the displaced persons be alleviated, and a safe haven be found for them in this country, or any other friendly Allied nation."

MARTIN DABROWSKI,
Chairman.
ALEXANDER BUCZEK,
Secretary.

MARCH 6, 1947.

MR. ALEXANDER BUCZEK,
Secretary, National Committee of Americans of Polish Descent, Inc.
Philadelphia, Pa.

DEAR MR. BUCZEK: I should like to convey to the members of your organization my appreciation for receiving a copy of a resolution adopted by Philadelphians of Polish descent on February 9, 1947, the anniversary of the uprising of 1863.

You know, of course, that my views on the recent Polish "elections" coincide with yours. The whole thing was a farce. In unprecedentedly strong language President Truman said substantially the same thing in his anything but cordial acceptance of the credentials of the new Polish Ambassador. I am sure we will continue all our efforts to see to it that Poland recaptures the control of her own destiny.

As for the problem of Polish displaced persons who understandably are unwilling to return to their homeland under its present regime, I have advocated for some time that this country offer a haven for many of these unfortunate refugees from tyranny by use of unused immigration quotas. I think it is to the credit of our Government that despite the expense of caring for these displaced persons, we have resisted every effort to force them to return against their will to Poland.

I think it would be advisable for an organization such as yours to express to President Truman your appreciation for the efforts he has already made in this tragic situation. So often, Mr. Truman receives only complaints. I know he would appreciate hearing how his efforts in the Polish situation are being appreciated by Americans of Polish descent.

Sincerely yours,

FRANCIS J. MYERS.

ECONOMY AND SOUND BUSINESS POLICIES IN GOVERNMENT

Mr. CAPPER. Mr. President, I have received a fine letter from F. W. Spaeth, of the Wyatt Manufacturing Co., Salina, Kans., setting forth the need of economy and sound business policies in Government affairs. I ask unanimous consent to have the letter printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE WYATT MANUFACTURING CO.,
Salina, Kans., February 18, 1947.

HON. ARTHUR CAPPER,
United States Senate,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR CAPPER: Today in Washington there seems to be a lot of wavering, compromising, or otherwise drifting away from the clearly defined program imparted by the millions of voters who have been completely fed up with the spend-crazed and leftish principles of the New Deal.

These voters have not in the least swayed away from their original objectives and the changes which must be made in Washington, but they are beginning to wonder if the new Congress is going to achieve the necessary changes, or will Congress use half-measures and continue to compromise with those who have been so power drunk and extravagant for so many years.

I believe there were four major objectives which the voters wanted, and which created the election reversal, as follows:

1. Adopt new labor legislation which will definitely remove the existing labor monopoly. Congress should stop being lolled into complacency by the apparent conciliatory "dove-of-peace" feeling now proffered by dictator union leaders. It is a guaranteed fact that they will remain holed up only so long as they are assured Congress will continue to weaken and forgive them—and make no important remedial changes in existing labor laws. They are hopeful that by staying out of sight Congress will again resort to half-measures—and as soon as those inedaquate compromises are written into law, it is also a guaranteed fact that there will be another long cycle of serious labor strife—continuing an upward inflation cycle.

2. Reduce the budget to a point, for practical comparisons, equal to that existing prewar, adding enough to cover defense needs, VA, and higher national debt interest—with a top ceiling around $30,000,000,000. No one, including many of those in high offices in bureaus, will not admit that there exists 15 to 20 percent pure waste in practically all legislative departments. Anyone who has been in Washington or in any Federal department, such as War Assets, will readily understand this statement. If the waste alone were eliminated, our budget would be less than thirty billion—without affecting to any degree any required program.

Voters hope the time has come when every dollar in the national budget should produce 100 cents for its service, and they have no reason to feel that a bureau head might not just as easily spend $2 or $3 for the $1 job, if Congress gives him $2 or $3 to spend. Voters feel that a ceiling on personnel might be a start, and then next they would like to know why the earning capacity of the bureau head depends on how many people are employed in his department. Many departments—many parasitic hangers-on which continue to mushroom, and which only seem to create more work for one another, rather than serve the people, should be eliminated instantly. A new psychology in the Government should be adopted that economy is to replace frenzied, idiotic extravagance.

3. Provide for national-debt reduction. We are entering a declining period with a national debt of two hundred and sixty billions. When will there be a better time than now, and possibly for a few more years, to reduce this figure? Unless there is a drastic budget reduction which can reduce the debt, and possibly provide some token-tax reduction, the present Republican Congress will be rightly blamed for having plunged the country into financial ruin within 10 years. This is not a farfetched statement in any sense of the word.

4. There should be a certain token reduction in taxes. Congress should get together on this, and stop playing politics. This should be a flat, across the board reduction, no matter what the percentage is—to help the working man make his pay check go further and to relieve the confiscatory taxes now on large incomes, thus permitting more incentive capital for plant and product expansion, guaranteeing more employment and higher working standards in the future, or at the very least permit many companies to have a narrow margin to cushion the shock when times change.

I feel that these four measures crystallize the expectations of the hopeful voters who held a minor revolution at the polls last November. Immediately before and after the election, a number of the successful Congressmen indicated that these things would be done, but apparently since then things have happened which have tended to befog these major issues.

Sincerely,

F. W. SPAETH.

REDUCTION IN TAXES AND GOVERNMENT SPENDING

Mr. CAPPER. Mr. President, I have received a letter from C. M. Hayman, 8201 Nall Avenue, Overland Park, Kans., offering several excellent suggestions with a view to encouraging tax reductions and reducing Government spending. I ask unanimous consent to have his letter printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

FORUM CAFETERIAS OF AMERICA, INC.,
Kansas City, Mo., February 28, 1947.

HON. ARTHUR CAPPER,
Senator, Senate Office Building,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: First, I would like to tell you that I think you are doing a grand job and that your efforts in our behalf are appreciated. Then I would like to express my opinion on the tax-relief situation and Government spending.

I favor the Knutson bill (H. R. 1) for a 20-percent across-the-board tax cut. This would make more money available for business expansion, which would mean more jobs. Our taxes are too high, anyway.

I believe that Government expenditures could, and should, be lowered. There are too many employees on the Government pay rolls. These people are needed in private industries.

Thank you for any consideration you may give the above.

Sincerely,

C. M. HAYMAN.

CARE AND CUSTODY OF CERTAIN INSANE PERSONS

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to introduce for appropriate reference a bill to provide for the care and custody of insane persons charged with or convicted of offenses against the United States, and for other purposes, and I request that a letter from the Acting Attorney General in connection with the bill may be printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the bill will be received and appropriately referred, and, without objection, the letter will be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill (S. 850) to provide for the care and custody of insane persons charged with or convicted of offenses against the United States, and for other purposes, introduced by Mr. WILEY, was received, read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

There being no objection, the letter presented by Mr. WILEY is as follows:

OFFICE OF THE ATTORNEY GENERAL,
Washington, D. C., March 6, 1947.

Hon. ALEXANDER WILEY,
Chairman, Committee on the Judiciary, United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: For the past several years the need for improvement in the manner of dealing with delinquents suffering from mental disorders has become increasingly apparent. A disturbing number of persons are being sentenced for Federal offenses and sent to prison who, because of insanity, should not have been convicted, and who, because of their mental incapacity to participate rationally in their defense, should never have been brought to trial. There is another group of persons whose mental deficiency is not discovered until after trial and conviction but whose mental condition gives rise to the probability that they should never have been tried. A third group includes those who develop insanity while serving sentence and who have not recovered at the expiration of their terms of confinement but who cannot with saftey be set at large in their communities.

Of course, conviction of an insane person is void and open to attack on habeas corpus. Federal statutes, however, prescribe no procedure for determining the accused's mental competence to stand trial. The courts have dealt with the problem in various ways and it seems most desirable that a definite procedure be established for raising the question as to the competence of an accused to stand trial and for the determination of such issue. It is equally important that a procedure be available when preexisting insanity becomes manifest only after a person has been convicted and sent to the penitentiary. Likewise there should be some provision of law authorizing the continued restraint of such persons after their sentences expire.

By act approved May 13, 1930 (46 Stat. 270; 18 U. S. C. 871–880) the Congress authorized the establishment of a hospital for defective delinquents. This hospital is located at Springfield, Mo., and existing law includes authority for the placing therein of mentally defective Federal prisoners. The law also provides that when the sentence of an insane prisoner is about to expire, the prison officials shall notify the proper authorities of the State of his residence and deliver him into their custody. A most serious problem arises, however, when the legal residence of an insane prisoner cannot be determined or when the State authorities refuse to accept custody or fail to accord him proper care and treatment.

A committee of the judicial conference of senior circuit judges working in close cooperation with representatives of this Department has had this entire matter under consideration for a number of years. As a result of careful study a bill has been evolved which is designed to solve the present difficulties. I enclose a copy of the bill and recommend its enactment.

I have been advised by the Director of the Bureau of the Budget that this recommendation is in accord with the program of the President.

Sincerely yours,

DOUGLAS W. MCGREGOR,
Acting Attorney General.

CORRECTIONAL SYSTEM FOR JUVENILE OFFENDERS

Mr. KILGORE. Mr. President, at the request of the judicial conference I ask unanimous consent to introduce for appropriate reference a bill to provide a correctional system for youthful offenders, and I should like 1 or 2 minutes to explain the bill.

In the Seventy-ninth Congress, at the request of the judicial conference, I introduced a bill providing for a correctional system for youthful offenders, and establishing a probationary system for the United States courts. Because of objections on the part of the district courts, action was not taken in the Seventy-ninth Congress.

After further discussion by the judicial conference, and in agreement with the district courts, the bill I am now introducing was prepared. It is applicable to youthful offenders only, but permits the commission which is created to act in cases involving adult first offenders.

A few nights ago on a Nation-wide broadcast over the Columbia Broadcasting System, on a program called the Eagle's Brood, the question of juvenile delinquency within the United States was discussed. One cannot pick up a morning newspaper without reading something about juvenile delinquency, of acts committed within the District of Columbia, in the city of New York, in Detroit, in Pittsburgh, and all over the country. The purpose of this bill is to enable a study to be made, which may serve as the basis for necessary corrective action.

The bill, it is true, raises the age limit of a juvenile delinquent to 24 years. I think that is highly important at this time. Recently in the Nation's stress boys were taken at the ages of 17 and 18, juveniles; they were taught that results were the only things that counted, and that methods, violent or otherwise, necessary to attain the desired results, were excusable, so long as results were attained. With such a mental background and with such a training, which was forced upon them, to attempt now to punish them would be highly unfair. For that reason, I think the age level of juvenile delinquents should be for some time at least raised, to make allowance for those who were inducted at 18 or who enlisted at the age of 17, who were taught to kill and to commit acts of violence, so that now when they find themselves in a tight place they sometimes resort to force.

That is one of the principal purposes of the bill. It merely creates a Commission of three, one of whom would be the Superintendent of the Bureau of Prisons, working under the Department of Justice; another would be appointed by the United States Supreme Court, who would, of course, work in conjunction with the judiciary; the third would be appointed by the President of the United States, with the advice and consent of the Senate. The first of the three would draw no salary whatever. It would be the duty of the Commission, in conjunction with the Department of Justice, to devise a system for the handling of juvenile delinquents and such other cases of first offenders as might be referred to the Commission by the district courts, the idea being to return juvenile delinquents to society as useful citizens rather than to punish them unduly, to make of these youthful offenders worth-while citizens, rather than merely to lock them up as habitual criminals.

There being no objection, the bill (S. 857) to provide a correctional system for youthful offenders convicted in courts of the United States, introduced by Mr. KILGORE, was received, read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

THE PRESIDENTIAL TERM—AMENDMENT

Mr. LANGER (for himself and Mr. TAYLOR) submitted an amendment in the nature of a substitute intended to be proposed by them, jointly, to the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 27) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States relating to the terms of office of the President, which was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

PRINTING OF SPECIAL REPORT ENTITLED "THE PRESENT TREND OF CORPORATE MERGERS AND ACQUISITIONS" (S. DOC. NO. 17)

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, last Friday, pursuant to the provisions of the Clayton Act, the Federal Trade Commission sent to the Senate a special report entitled "The Present Trend of Corporate Mergers and Acquisitions." The report involves a matter of very great importance and I think it should be available to all Members of the Senate. I have consulted the majority leader, and I therefore request that the report be printed as a Senate document.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

AMERICAN CITIZENS HELD IN POLISH PRISONS

Mr. BROOKS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to submit a resolution, and ask that it be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the resolution will be read.

The resolution (S. Res. 92) was read, as follows:

Whereas Arthur Bliss Lane, formerly the American Ambassador to Poland, who has been recalled as a part of the American protest against the Provisional Polish Government's failure to grant free elections in accordance with the agreement made at Yalta, has stated publicly that despite his insistent efforts he was denied the opportunity to confer with approximately 100 American citizens held in Polish prisons for political reasons: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Committee on Foreign Relations is authorized and directed (1) to obtain a complete report regarding the status of these American citizens, (2) to ascertain what steps are necessary to obtain their liberation, and (3) to report to the Senate thereon at the earliest practicable date.

Mr. BROOKS. I ask that the resolution be appropriately referred.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the resolution submitted by the Senator from Illinois will be received and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. BROOKS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD as a part of my remarks two resolutions which were adopted by the Polish-American Congress on February 14, 1947, in the city of Washington.

There being no objection, the resolutions were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

WHY POLAND'S CASE SHOULD GO TO UNITED NATIONS

A petition to the United States Senate and the United States House of Representatives, adopted at the Second Annual Convention of the Supreme Council of the Polish American Congress, Inc., at Hotel Statler, Washington, D. C., February 14, 1947.

AN UNFULFILLED PLEDGE

On February 4, 1947, while receiving the mock-ambassador sent to Washington by the usurpers of Poland's sovereignty and the oppressors of the Polish Nation, the President of the United States declared that the United States joined with Great Britain and Soviet Russia at the Yalta and Potsdam Conferences in guaranteeing free elections in Poland. "It is a cause of deep concern to me and to the American people"—the President said—"that the Polish provisional government has failed to fulfill that pledge."

This statement of the President of the United States was corroborated fully and officially by the State Department on January 28, 1947, when it declared that, "* * * the provisional government (of Poland) * * * employed (during the election campaign) widespread measures of coercion and intimidation against democratic elements which were loyal to Poland although not partisans of the government bloc. In these circumstances the United States Government cannot consider that the provisions of the Yalta and Potsdam agreements have been fulfilled."

TERRORIZED ELECTION REFUTES WAR AIM

In the words of the Honorable ARTHUR H. VANDENBERG, President pro tempore of the United States Senate, delivered on the floor of the Senate on January 29, 1947, "* * * a world war which started in behalf of Polish liberty is something more than a rigged and terrorized election which defies and defeats every elementary concept of autonomy, self-determination and democracy and which nullifies the most solemn pledges of which Britain and the United States and Soviet Russia are capable. This finding now seems to be officially confirmed to a controlling degree by the statement issued by the State Department in Washington."

It was always the opinion of the 6,000,000 Americans of Polish descent, united in the Polish American Congress, that what Senator VANDENBERG rightly calls "defeat of every elementary concept of autonomy, self-determination, and democracy" actually was the result of the Yalta agreement which was never ratified by the United States Senate and is therefore null and void. Under this perfidious agreement Poland, deprived of its national sovereignty, partitioned by her allies, had a government imposed upon her people by a foreign power. The only point which was designed to conceal the fact that the Yalta agreement was a complete capitulation to Russian aggressive imperialism at the expense of Poland was the proviso under which free and unfettered elections were to be held in Poland.

The leading United States authorities have now declared this proviso was violated. They express the view of the majority of Americans that the Yalta agreement, fraught with mortal dangers for the peoples of Europe and the Western Hemisphere, the United States included, has lost its validity.

THE CASE CANNOT REST

The Supreme Council of the Polish American Congress, assembled at its annual convention in Washington, D. C., desires to point to the conclusions reached by Senator VANDENBERG in his speech of January 29, 1947, namely, that there cannot be any thought "of resting the case upon the mere filing of an unpursued indictment, when the indictment charges basic violation of the very fundamentals of the Atlantic Charter and the United Nations Charter. There must be a more convincing answer." The Supreme Council of the Polish American Congress, fully shares Senator VANDENBERG's conviction that the United States cannot rest the Polish case after having filed an indictment.

The above-mentioned statements of President Truman and Senator VANDENBERG, substantiated and corroborated by eye-witness reports of numerous American correspondents who observed the "vicious travesty upon the promised freedom and democracy in Poland"—reveal a flagrant violation of the Charter of the United Nations.

HUMAN RIGHTS OF UNITED NATIONS CHARTER VIOLATED

The Government of Soviet Russia, indulging since 1939 to this day in threat or use of force against the territorial integrity or political independence of any state, stands accused of this violation under article 2, paragraph 4, of the Charter. Moreover, the conduct of the Government of Soviet Russia clearly violates the stipulations of the preamble of the Charter of the United Nations, to wit: "We the peoples of the United Nations are determined * * * to reaffirm faith in fundamental human rights, in the dignity and worth of the human person, in the equal rights of men and women and of nations larger and small, and to establish conditions under which justice and respect for the obligations arising from treaties and other sources of international law can be maintained."

This conduct also violates stipulations of paragraphs 1 and 2 of article 1 of said Charter, to wit: "The purposes of the United Nations are: (1) To maintain international peace and security and to that end to take effective collective measures for the prevention and removal of threats to the peace, and for the suppression of acts of aggression or other breaches of the peace * * *. (2) To develop friendly relations among nations based on respect for the principle of equal rights and self-determination of peoples."

CASE IS TEST FOR UNITED NATIONS FUNCTION

Being deeply convinced that American security and the value of official pledges as well as basic principles of conduct in international affairs are at stake in the test case of Poland, the Supreme Council of the Polish-American Congress, Inc., expresses its confidence that the case of Poland, temporarily closed by the illegal, null, and void Yalta agreement, will be reopened before the supreme international body of the General Assembly of the United Nations as a first step toward restoration of justice and principles of decency in international relations.

The Supreme Council of the Polish American Congress, therefore respectfully petitions the Senate and the House of Representatives to take all necessary steps in order to have the case of Poland submitted to the General Assembly of the United Nations.

However, it is not Poland that shall stand accused before the United Nations. The people of Poland cannot be brought to justice and punished for what has been and is being done to them by their alien oppressors. The Polish people should not be penalized by withdrawal of relief from abroad or by any similar actions, because they are not guilty of the crimes perpetrated upon them by the totalitarian regime of Soviet Russia and its agents acting in Poland. Action should be taken against the oppressor and his agents and not against the oppressed.

Having carefully considered all the facts and circumstances of the case of Poland as presented by official United States Government statements and bearing in mind that very recently, namely on December 12, 1946, the General Assembly of the United Nations acted with regard to a country, which is not occupied by a foreign power, on a case in which a distinction was made between the interests of the people and those of a government, the Supreme Council of the Polish American Congress, Inc., is convinced that the United States Government should submit the case of Poland to the General Assembly of the United Nations, thus paving the way to further action aiming at recall of Russian occupational troops and full restoration of Poland's sovereignty and territorial integrity.

RESOLUTION ADOPTED BY THE SUPREME BOARD OF THE POLISH AMERICAN CONGRESS AT ITS ANNUAL MEETING ON FEBRUARY 14 IN WASHINGTON, D. C.

On March 15 1947, at a peace conference to be held in Moscow, our foreign policy and the future of the world will be put to a test. The main subject will be the role Germany is to play among the nations of Europe, whom they ruthlessly destroyed.

The result of this conference will not only determine the basis on which peace and stability will be founded in Europe, but it also will constitute a true measure of our victory and moral achievements of this war.

As Americans of Polish descent, we are deeply concerned with our position and result thereof concerning the United States and Poland.

It is unfortunate that the United States will again be on the defensive in Moscow, due to grave political errors committed during the war, by accepting the road of retreat through appeasement and sacrifices, at Teheran, Yalta, Moscow, and Potsdam.

Today we learn of demonstrations against the United States in China and Italy, the Yugoslavs shoot down our planes, in Poland a campaign to disseminate hatred of the United States has become one of the principal aims of the Soviet-dominated puppets and the puppets in other countries. We have agreed to relinquish such important strategic positions as the southern part of Sakhalin and some of the Kurile Islands; we are being constantly harassed at the United Nations where attempts are being made to wrest the control of the atomic bomb from the United States; in Germany we have yielded every political, military, and moral advantage. We are going to Moscow carrying the fatal heritage of Yalta. In other words, we are going to Moscow to salvage whatever is left after these grave losses.

It will be in Moscow that the United States will again be challenged and again, as before, the cause of Poland will be the testing stone.

Whatever happens in Poland and to Poland is to a great extent our responsibility.

It was only recently, in connection with the outcome of elections in Poland, that the President and our State Department acknowledged our responsibility.

Had it not been for the United States, half of Poland and 12,000,000 Polish citizens would not have been delivered into Soviet bondage. Had we not agreed to destroy Poland from within by accepting the Russian fifth column in the form of a puppet government—Poland would still be our free ally instead of being a tool of Russia.

Had Poland been protected by the United States, the Soviet would not have been able to reach the heart of Europe over prostrated Poland. Poland—the first to fight—the last to quit—has lost half of its territory—by a secret agreement—not her own—reached at Yalta. The people of the United States join the people of Poland denying the validity of such an agreement. History will some day demand an account why half of Poland was given to Soviet Russia. It would be our shame to admit that this happened against the will of the Polish people, without the approval of the Senate of the United States. Therefore, our delegates to the conference in Moscow should not recognize Yalta as binding the United States; they should not accept the eastern boundaries of Poland as definitely established, they should denounce and repudiate Yalta and invoke the four freedoms, the Atlantic Charter, and the Charter of the United Nations.

Our delegates must not accept the enslavement of Poland as an accomplished fact. It is not accomplished. It has no moral or legal basis, it is against the will of our peoples; it violates every principle for which we fought and, above all, it endangers the peace and reaches the very foundations of the United Nations organization.

To start out by discussing the boundaries of Germany—without reviewing the eastern boundaries of Poland, would be tantamount to accepting the pattern of Munich and Yalta instead of the Atlantic Charter and the aims of the United Nations.

The United States' moral line of defense in Europe is in Poland's eastern boundaries. It is there that we have been defeated—it is there that we must win: Be it therefore

Resolved, That this resolution be transmitted to the Secretary of State, to the Members of the United States House of Representatives, to the Members of the United States Senate, and to the American delegates to the United Nations organization.

Resolutions committee: Adam Olszewski, Chairman; Peter P. Yolles, Z. Stefanowicz, K. Piatkiewicz, J. Trzaska, Mrs. M. Korpanty, Rev. W. Sikora, Rev. S. Zjawinski, L. Lesnicki, F. J. Wazeter, A. Gadek, W. Kosicki, J. Przymusinski, Mrs. J. Karlowiczowa, M. Kowalski, Rev. F. Burant, S. W. Warakomski.

Mr. BROOKS. Mr. President, from what we hear in the corridors of the Congress and what we read in the press, we learn that great decisions are impending; and as we look to our responsibility for the future, I belive that the resolution which I have submitted and those which were adopted by the Polish-American Congress might well be brought to the attention of America to remind us of the things which we have allowed to happen in the past.

JOINT MEETING OF THE TWO HOUSES

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, I ask the Chair to lay before the Senate House Concurrent Resolution 28, and I ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. IVES in the chair) laid before the Senate the concurrent resolution (H. Con. Res. 28), providing that the two Houses of Congress assemble in the Hall of the House of Representatives on Wednesday, March 12, 1947, at 1 p. m., which was read, considered, and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That the two Houses of Congress assemble in the Hall of the House of Representatives on Wednesday, March 12, 1947, at 1 p. m., for the purpose of receiving such communications as the President of the United States shall be pleased to make to them.

VIEWS AND PROPOSALS ON LABOR LEGISLATION

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, I desire to discuss at some length today some of my views and proposals on labor legislation. The Senate Committee on Labor and Public Welfare has just completed several weeks of public hearings on the multitude of suggestions and recommendations which witnesses and Members of the Congress have offered as legislative remedies for some of the Nation's labor ills. These have been excellent hearings which I have attended as faithfully as my other Senate duties have permitted.

When I have not been able to be in attendance at the committee hearings, I have read the prepared statements of witnesses which have been filed with the members of the committee, in most instances 24 hours before the testimony was given. I have followed the transcript of the record of the hearings very carefully. I wish to commend the chairman of the committee the senior Senator from Ohio [Mr. TAFT] for the way the hearings have been conducted and for their thoroughness, in spite of the limited time which could be set aside for public hearings.

It seems to me that the hearings have covered just about every conceivable point of view that could be presented on labor legislation. As the chairman of the committee suggested when the public hearings were closed last Saturday, we could go on and hold hearings on this subject for many more weeks, and I am sure there would be plenty of additional witnesses to hear, but such a procedure would be cumulative because the record we have already made in the few weeks we have conducted hearings contains much repetition of the same points of view and suggestions.

Furthermore, it should be noted that the committee will have the benefit in its executive meetings and discussions of the records of the public hearings which the Senate Committee on Education and Labor conducted on proposed labor legislation during the Seventy-ninth Congress. The chairman of our committee has made it very clear that the views of those witnesses who testified at our hearings during the Seventy-ninth Congress, but who were not recalled at the hearings of the Senate Committee on Labor and Public Welfare just closed, will be made available to the members of the committee.

Of course, it should be recognized by all that the most important work of the committee must now be done in executive sessions, at which meetings and discussions their job will be to thrash out the merits of the conflicting points of view of the many witnesses who have been before us, as well as the differences of points of views of the members of the committee itself, to the end of trying to come forward with the most fair, reasonable, and effective proposals for labor legislation that a majority of us can agree upon.

In other words, I think that our task is to write a committee legislative program rather than recommend as a committee, without any changes, any of the bills now pending before the committee—including my own.

I do not know how many of the other members of the committee feel the way I do about it, but I shall not be surprised to find that such a view is pretty much the consensus of opinion. I do not know of any member of the committee who wants to do injury to the legitimate rights of either labor or industry. If the result of some of the legislation proposed would do grievous injury to the legitimate rights of labor, industry, and the public—and I think the passage of some of the legislation would result in such injuries—I am convinced that no member of the committee is motivated by any desire to accomplish such undesirable and unfair results.

I know how easy it is to attribute motives and designs to holders of public office, because each one of us in the Senate is frequently victimized by such unfair tactics. However, differ as we may within the committee, I am satisfied that each and every member of the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare is motivated by only one desire, and that is to do what he thinks is best for his country, by way of labor legislation, without any motivation to injure the rights of labor, employers, or any other group in the country.

As I have listened to the witnesses appearing before our committee, I have at the same time been working on a series of proposals for amendments to the Wagner Act. I would be less than honest if I did not say that the many conflicting points of view which have been presented at the hearings; the myriad of legal technicalities that must be considered in drafting legislation if the legislation is to meet the tests of our constitutional system; the implications and economic effects of labor legislation in such a complex field of human relations as labor relations; all have made the task I have undertaken a very difficult one.

I am afraid I have not helped the paper shortage any by the number of wastebaskets I have filled with discarded legislative work sheets. However, as we have gone through the hearings I have tried out some of my ideas on the various experts who have come before us, with the result that I think each suggestion by way of amendments to the Wagner Act, which I shall make in this speech today has been discussed to a greater or less extent in the hearings.

I have waited to introduce my amendments until now primarily for two reasons. First, I simply have not been able to complete the work until now because the views and arguments which have been presented at the hearings have compelled me time and time again to study some new angle of the problem as raised by the hearings, and frequently to discard previously held views.

Second, I thought it highly desirable to take advantage of the hearings themselves as an aid to drafting the legislation and then make available to the committee for its most important work in executive session my proposed legislative recommendations.

In offering certain specific amendments to the Wagner Act today, I wish to make very clear that they are not final with me. My mind is completely open regarding them, and I shall consider changes in them as we debate them in committee and here on the floor of the Senate.

Next, I want to make clear that the proposals I offer today are not the only proposals I will consider favorably when it comes to voting upon labor legislation in this session of Congress. There are other legislative proposals pending which involve some suggestions which I shall favor when the final vote is taken. Nevertheless, I hope that as a result of executive sessions of our committee we shall be able to iron out many of these proposals in legislative form in a manner so satisfactory that a vote for them will be absolutely sound and justifiable.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. IVES in the chair). Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from New Jersey?

Mr. MORSE. I yield.

Mr. SMITH. In view of the statement the Senator from Oregon has just made, I ask him whether he feels that the right approach to labor legislation should be by amendment of the Wagner Act or by both such amendment and additional labor legislation?

Mr. MORSE. I think we must have legislation over and above amendments to the Wagner Act.

Mr. SMITH. Does the Senator think that primarily we should amend the Wagner Act itself?

Mr. MORSE. The contribution I am trying to make is by way of amendments to the Wagner Act, and then I shall be very happy to cooperate with the Senator from New Jersey and other Senators to perfect additional legislation going over and above amendments to the Wagner Act.

Mr. SMITH. I thank the Senator.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, for example, I am not offering anything on the portal-to-portal pay problem, but surely we must have some legislation in this field. I intend to vote for some legislation in this field, but I hope it will be legislation that will limit itself to the portal-to-portal pay issue rather than to seek to use that issue as a device for destroying any of labor's hard-won, legitimate rights under the Fair Labor Standards Act.

I have not given an intensive study to all the recommendations of the Subcommittee of the Judiciary Committee which has been working on the portal-to-portal-pay problems, but I shall be very much surprised if we shall not be able to take the legislation finally proposed by that committee and pass at least its main provisions. I say that because I know that the senior Senator from Missouri [Mr. DONNELL] and his colleagues on the subcommittee have been giving to the portal-to-portal-pay problems the type of conscientious study and thorough analysis which in my opinion is bound to result in a legislative analysis of the problems on which we can base sound legislation.

Furthermore, I am not introducing any legislation such as that prohibiting mass picketing, as I believe that is going to be covered in some other legislation. Moreover, I have not as yet been able to make up my mind as to just how we should handle mass picketing if we are to handle it at all, by way of Federal legislation. I certainly hold no brief for mass picketing but I am inclined to think that as far as a legislative remedy for its abuses is concerned it is one which should be solved primarily by State legislation.

However, it may be that when we come to discuss the problem in executive sessions of our committee, we can reach some agreement as to what should be done, if anything, by the Federal Government with the problem of mass picketing. It has always been my view that mass picketing is an abuse of, rather than in keeping with, the constitutional right of free speech and free assemblage. Nevertheless, I think it is a matter which falls primarily within the province of the police powers of the State rather than within any of the delegated powers of the Federal Government.

There are certain practices of unions not specifically covered by the amendments I am offering today, which other Members of the Congress are attempting to regulate by other pieces of legislation they have introduced. I hope we can work out, by way of conscionable compromises, modifications of their proposals so that the legitimate objectives they seek can be accomplished without destroying the basic right of workers to organize into unions and run their own affairs without having constantly to fight a battle against unfair restrictive legislation.

Mr. DONNELL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MORSE. I yield.

Mr. DONNELL. May I ask the distinguished Senator whether, in the event it be developed that mass picketing interferes with interstate commerce and with the flow of such commerce, he would regard it as beyond the power of the Federal Government to legislate upon that subject?

Mr. MORSE. Not at all. I think it is on that premise that any Federal legislation respecting mass picketing should be founded. I think an examination of the record of some of our important labor disputes will disclose indisputable evidence that the type of picketing indulged in has in fact interfered with free flow of interstate commerce.

Mr. DONNELL. I thank the Senator.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, just how to strike the balance between too little Government control and too much Government control in this complex field of labor relations presents a real test of the legislators' statesmanship. I wish I could say that I know for a certainty just exactly how far the Government should go by way of legislation in these matters, but the fact is I am not at all sure about it. I suspect that most of those who are speaking with such finality on the subject are no nearer to a sound answer to the problem than are those of us who frankly say we do not know for a certainty what should be done.

However, the fact that we recognize the limitations of the legislative approach to the solution of our labor-employer problems is no justification for our taking the position that we should not at least try to draft some legislation that will be helpful in meeting the public demand for greater stability in employer-labor relations. Hence, as a matter of principle, I shall not oppose fairly worded legislation which seeks to protect the rights of the individual worker to the type of protection which would flow from guaranteeing to him certain democratic procedures in the conducting of union affairs.

For example, I have always been at a loss to understand why unions particularly object to making public their financial statements. Most good unions for many years have made their financial statement a matter of public record. Likewise, I shall certainly be open-minded on the legislative suggestion that the check-off system should rest upon the written consent of the individual worker; and in the absence of that consent the employer should not be required to check off his union dues. I think I know the pros and cons of this issue, but I think the right of the individual to protection from having money taken away from him for any purpose without his consent is paramount to the matter of the dues-collecting convenience to the union in having an automatic check-off system.

Operating a check-off system without the written consent of the individual worker causes many people to think that some unions are more interested in union dues than they are in union service to their members. I think that, by and large, this is an unfair criticism but an understandable one whenever the automatic check-off system results in friction in labor relations—and certainly it has done that in a multitude of instances.

I mention the point that I am not introducing legislation on certain labor subjects this afternoon in order to make clear that I am not offering any omnibus labor bill. There are those in my State who seem to think that I should offer a catch-all omnibus labor bill designed to cover all possible legislative approaches to labor problems under one bill. I am very much opposed to that approach to passing legislation, not only in the field of labor relations but in most legislative fields dealing with human relations and economic problems.

Rather, I think the best approach to such problems is to handle each labor issue in a separate bill or at least include in one bill only those issues which can be separated from the rest of the bill and voted upon as separate and individual sections of the bill. Thus in the proposals I make this afternoon, insofar as amending the National Labor Relations Act is concerned, it would be possible for us to consider them together or consider each one separately.

In my judgment there are many reasons for making such a legislative approach, all of which are well known to my colleagues in the Senate but often overlooked by our citizenry generally.

First, I would mention the one of legislative strategy. An omnibus bill, as a matter of legislative form, is not the best type of law to be on the statute books, because our law reports are full of decisions in which the courts have thrown out all or part of such bills because of inconsistencies, ambiguities, and irreconciliabilities within them. I know of no more beautiful example of what I mean than the Case bill of the Seventy-ninth Congress. I felt that it would provide a field day for lawyers, and before American employers got through with all the litigation that would be stirred up by that omnibus bill, they would wish they never had heard of it.

In fact, I noticed that the longer employers studied the Case bill of the last Congress the more they reached the conclusion that it was a legal monstrosity—or at least a full-employment bill for industrial relations lawyers. On this point I think it important to point out that the adoption of legislation as drastic as the Case bill type of legislation is going to throw into litigation a great many well-established principles of American labor law. If such legislation passes, it will not be very long before the charge will be made that many antilabor employers are attempting to litigate their unions out of existence.

That will not produce industrial peace in America. We are not going to solve our problems of industrial unrest by enacting legislation which will bring employers and unions into antagonistic relationships in the courts of America. I see no hope of solving labor problems by litigation, and I am fearful that much of the legislation that is being proposed would result in a great multiplicity of court actions which would not be conducive to harmonious employer-employee relations.

Court litigation over labor relations is somewhat different from the usual situation between plaintiff and defendant. Usually when two citizens in a civil action get to the point that they find themselves opposed to each other in court, it is not to be expected that following the court action they are to be thrown together again in further business relations with each other. Usually at least they try to avoid such future relationships.

However, that is not true of the parties to labor litigation. In most instances economic circumstances force them to continue to try to work together, and that is bound to be made more difficult if they resort to litigation against each other through the courts.

All I am trying to point out here is that conflicts in the field of labor relations between parties who must continue, in the very economic nature of things, to work together as a usual thing cannot best be solved by trying to beat each other in the courts.

I have met very few persons who were satisfied when they lost a case in court, or who felt very friendly toward the opposing party who beat them in court action. Hence I merely wish to point out that various omnibus labor bills that seek to solve our labor problems by court procedures and sanctions will in the long run not prove to be very much of a boon to American industry.

Furthermore, I do not like the omnibus labor bill approach because from the standpoint of legislative strategy in passing legislation, the task is made more difficult because such bills tend to rally the opponents of each section of the bill into a combination of effective opposition against the entire bill. Too frequently an omnibus bill puts a legislator in a position in which he has to decide whether he will vote against the entire bill, because of his disapproval of certain parts of it, or vote against his own convictions as to the objectionable parts in order to pass some legislation on the general subject covered by the bill.

Legislators differ in their points of view as to how they should vote under such circumstances. It seems to me that unless one's objections to some parts of an omnibus bill are only minor objections and do not involve matters of vital principle, he has no other choice but to vote against a bill which he cannot support in its entirety. Hence I think it is much easier to work out conscionable legislative compromises in support of bills that are much more limited in scope than omnibus bills.

I speak of conscionable compromises because I think we should try to make clear to the American people that the very essence of the legislative process is compromise and our task is to work out the fairest and most reasonable compromises we can in this field of labor legislation, so long as they do not do irreparable injury to the basic rights of labor and industry. I think it is much easier to do that when we try to handle only a limited segment of labor problems in an individual bill rather than try to cover the whole alphabet of labor issues from A to Izzard in one bill.

In addition, it should be said that as a general practice the omnibus type of bill usually goes much further than is necessary to accomplish the objectives which need to be accomplished. I think that is due to a basic drafting problem which is inherent in constructing an omnibus bill. When one tries to cover in a single bill a great many issues with varying degrees of relationships to each other, it becomes necessary to use language so broad in scope in many places in the bill, so as to include within it, as we say, everything but the kitchen sink. Thus the result is that when one gets through he usually finds that the bill, particularly if it is a labor bill, has so restricted freedom of action that the proposed law becomes an enforcement impossibility.

In the proposals I am making today I am not offering any labor code by way of an omnibus labor bill. I hope that my suggestions will prove to be as constructive as I think they are, and that when considered along with other reasonable proposals which I am sure we shall work out together as a result of our deliberations on the Labor Committee, we shall be able to offer to the Senate and to the people of the country some legislative proposals that can be characterized as being moderate, fair, and reasonable.

Personally, I think that should be our objective in this session of Congress. I think we should try to pass legislation which will be moderate, fair, and reasonable. We have a duty of trying to persuade the American people to see that we cannot solve labor problems by passing legislation based on emotional attitudes or out of a spirit of revenge or an angry desire to punish labor for some of its excesses.

We in Congress have been criticized frequently because we have not pulled some legislative rabbit out of a hat and thereby, with a stroke of the magician's wand, given our people at least an imaginative relief or illusionary remedy on the stage of labor relations. It has been my policy to work conscientiously with those of my Senate associates who recognize that the important job is not to perform a legislative magician's act that will fool the people into believing that the country's labor ills can be solved by legislation, but rather that our job is to produce such changes in our procedural machinery for settling labor disputes as will make successful and effective the operation of the voluntary principles of free collective bargaining within the framework of such reasonable controls by law as are necessary to protect the legal and property rights of the parties to a given dispute as well as the public.

To that end I made certain specific proposals in the last session of Congress, but in many instances we did not even get to the point of submitting a committee report to the Senate. In the Seventy-ninth Congress I felt that we should pass a resolution which called for a Senate investigation of both employer and union practices and policies which were and are causing labor difficulties. In fact, in a meeting of the Committee on Education and Labor I offered an amendment to the Kilgore resolution which broadened that resolution to cover an investigation of union practices and policies as well as employer practices and policies.

A majority of the members of the committee agreed with me on this amendment, with the result that when we made our report to the Senate the resolution was so broadened. However, as the record shows, our bill did not get very far on the floor of the Senate. I think that if we had made such an investigation last year as proposed by our resolution, our task in this session would be an easier one. I was satisfied that it was only a matter of time before the demand for labor legislation would be so great that Congress in keeping with democratic pressures and processes—and rightly so—would deem it absolutely necessary to pass some sort of labor legislation.

I wanted investigative groundwork laid for that legislation last summer and fall so that there could be no question whatsoever about our legislation resting upon sound, objective data. However, that was not done, and now we find ourselves in the position where I think legislation will be passed on the basis of such information as we have at hand.

Also, in this last session of Congress I urged, when the proposed new minimum wage bill was before the Committee on Education and Labor that it be amended so as to provide for a 2-year statute of limitations in retroactive-pay cases. Officials of the Wage and Hour Division in the Department of Labor opposed my views, as did the principal labor leaders of the country and some of the members of the Labor Committee.

However, those of us who favored such a 2-year statute of limitations prevailed in the committee, and the bill which was reported to the floor of the Senate contained such a proposal. Nevertheless, as the Senate knows, the bill was lost in the legislative shuffle, and we came out of the Seventy-ninth Congress with no bill at all.

At that time the Gwynne bill, with its proposed 1-year statute of limitations, was pending in the House. I think this is entirely too short a period and would result in anything but a moderate, fair, and reasonable solution to the problem. Be that as it may, the fact is that at least part of the portal-to-portal pay crisis would not have confronted this session of Congress if those of us who fought for a 2-year statute of limitations amendment to the Fair Labor Standards Act, insofar as retroactive-pay cases are concerned, had succeeded in having our views prevail in the Seventy-ninth Congress.

I digress for a moment to point out that we have not the slightest idea of the effect which such a 2-year statute of limitations might have had on the judicial decisions which have been rendered since the adjournment of the Seventy-ninth Congress. I deeply regret that we were not able in that session of the Congress to pass such a statute of limitations with such retroactive-pay provisions as were recommended and as the majority of my colleagues supported on the floor of the Senate.

Likewise in the Seventy-ninth Congress there were many of us who favored the creation of an independent mediation, conciliation, and arbitration board. Again in this session of Congress we are making the same proposal in two or three different forms. Here again I am perfectly willing to go along with any reasonable compromise, but I think it is very important that we set up an adequate mediation, conciliation, and arbitration service. I say that because, after many years of experience in the field of arbitration, I think there is a great opportunity for the development of a set of procedures for the settlement of labor disputes through conciliation, mediation, and arbitration which, when put into practice, would materially reduce the use of economic action in the settlement of labor disputes.

I simply refuse to dismiss from my mind the thought and hope that American labor and employers will have the good sense to recognize that they must stop trying to take advantage of each other by resorting to Government compulsions. They should see the handwriting on the wall and recognize that they must make free collective bargaining work by acting in good faith toward each other.

A Federal as well as State conciliation, mediation, and arbitration service, operating through a board which offers its services on a purely voluntary basis, is in keeping with my very deep conviction that the only long-time hope for peaceful settlement of labor disputes is through the voluntary action of the parties to those disputes.

I care not what legal machinery we set up so long as it rests on Government compulsion it will be causative to some degree—and I fear to a much greater degree than most people suspect—of serious friction between employers and labor when either one resorts to Government compulsion and sanctions for the settlement of difficulties.

I readily admit that in some cases it will be necessary to use some such sanctions in order to force settlements of differences in labor relations as to which both labor and employers have demonstrated that they cannot be counted upon to reach amicable solutions. In those instances in which the public interest is damaged by a failure of labor and employers to live up to their obligations I shall never hesitate, now or in the future any more than I have in the past, to take the position that Government must protect the public interest.

I believe that the Government must step in and act in such cases. By doing so it protects not only the public's interest but, in the long run, the best interests of labor and employers and the best interest of the American system of free collective bargaining. I say that because when the negotiations of major labor disputes break down to the degree that a very large segment of our economy is threatened with paralysis, then neither labor nor industry has the right in the name of freedom to bring suffering upon a large segment of the Nation or upon the entire Nation.

I think we can preserve free collective bargaining in this area of so-called essential industry without permitting either labor or employers to paralyze the Nation by prolonging strikes. I would not destroy labor's right to strike in such instances, because I recognize that there are times and circumstances when the attention of the country needs to be directed to the plight of some of our workers in these industries by strike action.

We cannot ignore the fact that the use of economic action in some of our great major industries in this country over the period of our history has been necessary to educate the American people to an understanding of the intolerable conditions that some of our fellow citizens have had to endure in these industries.

I wonder where the mine workers of America, or even our railroad workers, would be today from the standpoint of their standard of living if they had not had the right to strike. On this point it should be mentioned that of course the public itself is not a very good employer when its economic toes are stepped on.

The record is clear that the public has from time to time resisted paying increased rates for various types of public service when the increase has been necessary to provide a decent standard of living for the workers in those services. Frequently it has been necessary to stage a rather tough strike in order to educate the public into an understanding as to why it should itself be a better employer. However, here again we are dealing with the problem of degree as to how far we need or should go with economic action in essential industries where a stoppage causes great national suffering and loss.

I cannot ignore the fact that when there is such a break-down in a system of voluntarism covering the relations between employers and labor, governmental intervention and compulsion are always at the cost and loss of some freedom; but if labor and employers, by conduct which jeopardizes the public interest, insist upon abusing their freedom, I do not know what else our Government can do but attempt to restrict such harmful actions by passing the most reasonable legislation necessary to accomplish that end.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. MORSE. I yield.

Mr. SMITH. Does the Senator have in mind the possibility of extending that part of the Smith-Connally Act which provides for the Government's taking over in those cases and possibly handling them along the line of a recent decision of the Supreme Court of the United States?

Mr. MORSE. I will say to the Senator from New Jersey that I do not have in mind extending any part of the Smith-Connally Act, because I think it should die.

Mr. SMITH. I agree with the Senator.

Mr. MORSE. I think it should have been repealed long before this; indeed, I think it never should have been passed because, in my opinion, it has not been very helpful in producing labor harmony. But, to answer the Senator's question directly, I believe we will have to give consideration to new legislation which embodies the principle of the right of the Government to step in in the so-called national paralysis cases and exercise governmental control of the industries involved for the benefit, let me say, of neither party, whether labor or industry, so far as the financial rewards are concerned, until such time as the parties sit down and work out between themselves a free collective-bargaining contract.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, I am glad to hear the Senator from Oregon make that statement because my own thinking has been running along the same general line. I remind the Senator that at the hearing last Saturday, when Mr. LaGuardia, who was one of the authors of the Norris-LaGuardia Act, was present, he took exactly the same position, namely, that there might arise a crisis in which the Government would have to intervene, and in which even the injunctive process might have to be used, despite the fact that the use of that process is prohibited by the act of which he was a cosponsor—the Norris-LaGuardia Act.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, a little later in my remarks I shall make a comment on that principle.

Let me say, however, that as legislators we need to be careful that we do not go along with those who advocate legislation which would put the Government in the business of union busting. We must not support legislation, for example, which would make it profitable for either labor or industry to have the Government take over the railroads or the coal fields or public utilities as the result of a failure on the part of the parties to participate in good-faith collective bargaining. I think the Government should intervene in such cases only to the extent of protecting the public interest in an endeavor to do whatever it can by the use of governmental powers to provide the public with the minimum services necessary to alleviate their suffering until a settlement of the case can be reached—preferably by negotiations between the parties themselves.

It seems to me that the facts and circumstances of such cases are always going to vary to such a great degree that it is practically impossible to devise any piece of legislation that can be automatically applied to such cases. What I think we should try to work out is legislation which seeks to define the powers of Government in such cases, and thereby make perfectly clear to the parties, both labor and industry, that it is not the intention of the Government to stand idly by, impotent to act because of the failure of Congress to confer the power to do whatever the Government finds necessary to be done, under such circumstances, in order to protect the public interest. One of the sad commentaries about such major disputes as those involved in railroads, coal, and public utilities is that the parties themselves and everyone else in the country affected by such disputes know very well at the start of the stoppage that eventually the dispute will be settled on some reasonable terms—usually on terms closely approximating some of the sensible suggestions for settlement made at the very time the stoppage occurred. In fact, in most instances the stoppage itself has very little effect upon determining the terms of settlement. That is why in my opinion it is so important that we provide the parties to such disputes with whatever procedural machinery will be helpful to them in settling their disputes on a voluntary basis of free collective bargaining, mediation, conciliation, and arbitration, making clear to them that in the last analysis if they attempt to throw the country into an economic tailspin, the people, through their Government, will step in and will exercise the rights of the public which are superior to the selfish interests of the disputants.

I believe that in the executive sessions of our committee we are going to be able to reach some conscionable compromises on this type of legislation which will not go too far, but which at the same time will meet the demand of the public for greater Government participation in the settlement of such disputes.

However, one of the points I desire to stress today in this speech is that the American people are expecting entirely too much of labor legislation as a panacea for industrial ills. I am afraid that too many in the Republican Party, both in and out of Congress, have misled themselves into thinking that a maximum of industrial freedom in this country can be attained by putting American labor into a legislative strait-jacket. They have not stopped, I fear, to study the history of either the American labor movement or of the experiences which have resulted in the passage from time to time of restrictive, punitive labor legislation in some of our States.

Legislation of a punitive, restrictive, prohibitive type in the field of labor relations has invariably met with great resistance. It always provides the agitator and radical labor leader with plausible propaganda against employers. It permits of the emotion-arousing type of argument that "industry and your employers control the State legislatures, the Congress, and the courts, and through their political power even use the law to deny you economic justice." Unsound as such arguments are, the fact is that, when confronted with an unjust law, it is only natural that working people resent its passage and find it easy to attribute bad motives to both employers and public officials.

I think it is a fair statement to say that unfair restrictive labor legislation will always cause more labor trouble than it will ever be successful in preventing. What happens after the passage of such legislation is that, for a time, usually only for a brief time, labor suffers a setback; and then it begins to dig in along a united front, inspired by the single objective of freeing itself from the shackles of such unfair legislation.

Applying the old saying that "There is more than one way to skin a cat," clever devices of indirection, sympathetic resistance, noncooperation, and economic action are adopted. In other words, under such conditions labor unites to fight for what it considers to be its just and free rights. It is an old pattern that has been repeated over and over again throughout the history of the American labor movement; and it will always be repeated, in my judgment, so long as we attempt to do by legislation what American employers and workers should do by good-faith, free, collective bargaining.

We should remember that good faith cannot be legislated. A desire on the part of employers and labor to deal fairly with each other cannot be legislated. A conviction that our system of private enterprise is dependent upon a high standard of living and a high purchasing power for all groups in America, including labor, cannot be legislated. Unselfishness cannot be legislated. In other words, we should remember that the weaknesses of human nature cannot be corrected by legislation. However, we can and should set up by legislation the minimum standards and controls necessary to protect the commonly accepted rights of individuals and groups from being exploited and transgressed either by industry or by labor or by anyone else.

When we come to vote upon and pass labor legislation in this session of Congress, I hope we shall not forget that legislation in the social and economic fields should be tested by the question: Is enforcement of this law feasible? It is bad legislative policy and it is not in the interest of government by law to pass legislation which is going to be so opposed by such a large number of people that its enforcement becomes next to impossible. Of course, it is easy for anyone to say that if labor wants to make a test between itself and Government, then Congress should rise up and pass legislation in order to force that test; but there is not very much realism in such an attitude, because, when any law is unacceptable to such a large number of people that it cannot be enforced successfully, then it becomes a dead-letter law. We have many such laws on our statute books, and such a condition of nonenforceability does not breed a respect for government by law.

What I am trying to point out is that in a democratic society we cannot afford to place upon the administration of justice a greater strain than it can well bear. We do not strengthen government by law by passing legislation which is certain to break down in its enforceability.

As I listened to the witnesses testifying at our hearings on labor legislation during the past few weeks, I felt that many of them were making the mistake of thinking that a plausible paper plan for the handling of labor problems is synonymous with a workable plan. So many of them seemed to miss the vital difference between static theory and dynamic practice. They overlooked the human equation which is the most vital ingredient in the kettle of fish in which we now find ourselves, insofar as the labor crisis is concerned. Men just do not act the way they would have them act under their nicely drawn paper plans for settling labor controversies.

When we start tinkering legislatively with the livelihood of millions of our fellow-Americans we should know from experience that in organizational unity there is economic strength. We should not be so naive as to think that the passage of restrictive labor legislation which weakens both the unity and economic strength of organized labor is going to result in their sending us flowers of appreciation.

I think this is as good a place as any to direct attention to the main objective of the free labor movement as we have it in America. I appreciate the fact that it has many objectives, and now I am speaking of the objectives of a free labor movement as contrasted with the personal power objectives of some of the labor leaders in the country. However, in fairness to labor leaders it should be said that by and large the labor leaders of the country, big and small, are motivated primarily by the desire to improve the economic lot of the producers of the wealth which flows from the operation of American industry under our system of private property economy.

Their endeavors in that respect spring from the economic essence of the labor movement, and that is to secure for the workers a greater share of the wealth produced by their labors. I am not at all frightened by that objective. I recognize it as essential to preserving our capitalistic economy. I want to see that economy preserved, because, as I have said before, I think political democracy cannot be separated from economic democracy. By economic democracy I mean our American system of a private property economy which is the very heart of our competitive capitalistic system.

Here again we must look at the alternatives. What other type of economy could we have? Move away from a private property capitalistic economy and you move in the direction of a totalitarian economy. Call it what you will—national socialism, fascism, communism—they are one and the same thing insofar as their effects upon the rights, liberties, freedoms and dignities of the individual are concerned. In practice they spell out statism. They can survive only on the basis of an economy regimented, directed, and absolutely controlled by the state. They are synonymous with economic dictatorship. Neither American labor nor American employers should forget that their rights as individuals disappear under any system of totalitarianism.

It is a deep conviction of mine, and I have expressed it for many years, that a high standard of living for American workers is dependent upon making our capitalistic system work and fulfill its maximum economic potentialities. I do not think we have more than scratched the surface of the pontentialities of our economic system. There are still great economic frontiers for us to explore in advancing our American civilization under our system of political and economic democracy.

It is a mistake for people to brand as socialistic the objective of organized labor to secure for itself a more equitable share of the product of its labor. In fact, I think that if progress toward that objective will only keep pace with increased production of national wealth we shall have a complete rebuttal answer to those agitators and leftists who in some small cells of American labor are trying to convince workers that our capitalistic system denies them their economic rights.

When such propaganda is passed out against our American private property economy system it can be answered by pointing out that the individual does not have any rights as an individual economically, politically or otherwise under a totalitarian government with its economy of statism. Under a police state, the rights of the individual are subordinated to and subject to the dictates of the small group of dictators who run the country. Employers and businessmen, too, have no rights under the system of a totalitarian economy. Employers and businessmen of Germany and Italy learned that sad fact too late. They finally discovered that when they played into the hands of Hitler and Mussolini in helping those dictators destroy free trade-unions in Germany and Italy they thereby also helped destroy their own economic freedom as well. They were next on the list, and such a pattern marks all movements toward fascism.

In a communistic state freedom of employers and businessmen are destroyed first, and then the rights of workers become so circumscribed by police methods that they are destroyed next. Resistance means liquidation. Thus we find no free trade unionism under communism. It would be well for American workers always to remember that fact, even in moments of discontent. Likewise national socialism in its variety of forms also sacrifices liberties of the individual, and substitutes an economic dictatorship by government for individual incentive and ingenuity.

I am not one who believes that any of these totalitarian ideologies are a serious threat to a continuation of our American economic system based upon private property and the right to make fair profits from the investments of capital and wealth-producing enterprises. I do think that if we are to keep our system secure and economically healthy we must avoid depressions and the cycle of boom and bust. We cannot afford the economic loss which flows from such breakdowns in our economic machinery. We cannot justify the human suffering resulting from the unemployment, the hunger and the fears of economic insecurity which result from such breakdowns. They are unnecessary if American labor, industry, agriculture and all other segments of our economic population will recognize that it is not regimentation to develop cooperative planning between and among a friendly government, labor, industry, farmers and all the rest of us to the end of maintaining full employment, high production, and a fair distribution of profits. There is no other answer if our American system is to accomplish the great economic objectives of which it is capable.

I do not agree in any degree whatsoever with those who argue that depressions are a part of the price of freedom, or that economic insecurity for millions of our fellow American citizens is unavoidable under a free-enterprise system. If that were true, then the system would be for the enterprisers with little freedom for the rest of us. Those who hold to the views that depressions, unemployment, and economic insecurity are unavoidable social and economic results of our capitalistic system perform a great disservice to that system by so contending. They should recognize that depressions produce tremendous discontent, and greatly increase the number of people who in the midst of their troubles, fears, and panic reach the conclusion that they have little if anything to lose from an economic change. We saw signs of that during the early thirties, when some segments of our population showed some manifestations of direct action. It is out of such social phenomena that great political and economic changes can take place in a country.

However, I submit that the major objective of the American labor movement has served over our history as a great stabilizer of our capitalistic system. As our workers have joined themselves together in effective labor-union organizations for the advancement of their economic welfare they have succeeded over the years in raising the level of real wages to a point far above that of any other workers in the world.

It is not my intention in this speech to dwell at any length on the part that organized labor in America has played in improving the standard of living for all Americans but I do want to say in passing that, in my judgment, the standard of living of all Americans has benefited greatly from the economic campaign which organized labor has waged over the years for better wages, hours, and working conditions. I know of no group in our country who has benefited more from organized labor's endeavors to raise the standard of living of the workers of the country than American employers, businessmen, and industrialists themselves.

Our system of competitive enterprise can sustain itself only on the purchasing power of the consumers of the country. Lower that purchasing power and the charts and graphs of our economic statisticians begin to show immediately serious distortions in the movement of economic goods through the channels of trade. Paradoxical as it may seem the fact is that our profit system depends upon distributing profits into the pockets of the consumers of America. This includes for the most part the workers, the farmers, and the millions of people who make up our so-called white collar class. The base of that distribution of profits must be a wide one because upon the purchasing power of the American consumer depends the expansion and ever greater productivity of our private-enterprise system. Profits cannot be made out of a contracting and declining production. It is increased production and expansion through new industry which develops the economic power of our system and makes possible a higher purchasing power through a greater distribution of profits among our consumers.

However, labor has some grave responsibilities and obligations in connection with the operation of our capitalistic system. It has no more right to seek to profiteer at the expense of a stable economy than have the employers and the industrialists. Labor can destroy its own house if it listens to those radicals in its midst who would misrepresent the extent of profits being made by industry. The old adage about the goose that laid the golden egg sets forth a great and simple truth.

The need for applying a fair share of profits to new capital investments is too frequently ignored by some labor leaders when making their demands upon employers. Such capital investments are essential if we are to meet the needs at all times of full employment and increased production of national wealth out of which new tax dollars can flow. Labor must recognize that if we are to protect the value of the American dollar we are going to have to increase the production of new wealth out of which we can get the taxes necessary to reduce our national debt which in its present amount threatens the standard of living of all of us in the country, including labor.

Although this discussion of mine about basic objectives of the American labor movement and the relation of those objectives to the preservation of our capitalistic economy may seem somewhat remote from the problem of passing labor legislation in the Eightieth Congress, it is not in fact nearly so remote as it may seem at first glance. If we are to make our American system work we must remember that it will not and cannot work independent of reasonable governmental regulations and controls over all groups within the system.

The reason for that is that human beings are what they are. They tend to seek to advance their own selfish interests by taking advantage of the other fellow's interests. Labor is no exception to that rule of human conduct. It is no more entitled to exemptions from legal checks upon its excesses than are employers, businessmen, and corporations. It too must be required to advance its legitimate interests within a framework of law approved by the people as a whole. It does not follow that reasonable legal restrictions which protect the individual worker and the public from union excesses deny any fundamental freedoms to organized labor.

Certainly the principle of reasonable legal regulations and control, necessary to check excesses, does not in the abstract deny labor any basic rights. It is the application of the abstract principle in the form of specific legislation which presents the real test to us as legislators. However, the main point I wish to make in this part of my speech is that labor too, in a government of law rather than of men, must recognize that its rights are relative and not absolute, in that they must be exercised in a manner that will promote the common good and not just the selfish good of labor alone.

Our economic system cannot function in a prosperous way unless the Government, through friendly cooperation manifested through the democratic processes imposed upon all of us by the elected representatives of the people, sees to it that no economic group is allowed to take advantage of, transgress upon or exploit the rights of the public. I am afraid that sometimes some labor leaders and some labor groups so concerned about the economic difficulties which confront American workers make the mistake of thinking that the workers' economic interest can be considered separate and apart from our other national economic problems.

They overlook the fact that we must balance the interests of all groups in our economy or we cannot have long-time prosperity for any group. I want to see all consumer groups in the country progress steadily and as rapidly as possible consistent with national economic stability toward a higher standard of living, but that never will be accomplished if labor and industry fail to settle their problems through good-faith collective bargaining and stop resorting to all unnecessary economic action.

There is no denying the fact that legislation is going to be passed by the Eightieth Congress. I hope it will be constructive and helpful legislation rather than restrictive and punitive legislation. I hope that the Congress will exercise leadership rather than yield to pressure for punitive legislation in its attempts to improve industrial relations. It is to be regretted that much of the need for corrective legislation grows out of the failure on the part of labor to do voluntarily some of the things which now I am satisfied it must be required by law to do.

Although I shall discuss it at much greater length later in this speech, I wish to mention, as an example of what I mean, namely, jurisdictional disputes. In my judgment American labor cannot excuse itself for not settling jurisdictional disputes without resort to economic action. This is especially true of disputes between affiliates of the same parent, such as the A. F. of L. The right to organize, the right to strike, the right to carry on union activities, like all other rights which we as free Americans enjoy and are entitled to, are not absolute rights. It is basic to our system of law that rights must be exercised in such fashion as not to destroy or unreasonably to impinge upon the rights of others.

It is elementary that one of the cherished rights of our American system is the right to own private property, as contrasted with some forms of totalitarianism, such as communism. However, I must exercise my rights of private ownership of property in a manner which does not injure unwarrantedly either the property rights of others or the individual liberties of others.

Thus I have the right to buy a vacant lot on Sixteenth Street, but I do not have the right to build a slaughterhouse on the lot.

I have the freedom and the right to defend my home as my castle, but I do not have the right to use unreasonable force in ejecting a trespasser from my property.

All of us have to exercise our property rights and our personal liberties within a legal framework of law which imposes upon those rights and liberties many limitations necessary in order to protect the fair rights of others and the public welfare. When we abuse our rights to the detriment of others—and in many instances to the detriment of ourselves—then government through law steps in and checks our course of action on the very sound theory that there is a difference between freedom and license.

Unfortunately some of the practices and abuses of labor are doing violence to our concepts of freedom and liberty because they are, through the exercise of license, injuring the common good. The jurisdictional dispute is a good example of what I mean. It violates the property and personal rights of innocent third parties, including both employers and the general public.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have published at this point in my remarks an analysis of existing types of jurisdictional disputes. In this memorandum I have tried to make available to the Members of the Senate a description of the various types of jurisdictional disputes. There is so much misunderstanding about jurisdictional disputes and what they involve that I thought it would be helpful to include in my remarks some descriptive and definitional material. I shall not take time to read the memorandum now, but ask to have it printed in the RECORD at this point as exhibit 1.

There being no objection, the memorandum was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

JURISDICTIONAL DISPUTES

The term, "jurisdictional disputes," has been used very loosely to cover a great variety of situations that have as their common ingredient a controversy between two or more labor unions. Before discussing the specific provisions of the proposed bill on this subject, it will be useful to consider the type of disputes commonly labeled as jurisdictional disputes and the decisions of the National Labor Relations Board dealing with such controversies.

The following controversies have at one time or another been termed "jurisdictional disputes."

TYPE OF JURISDICTIONAL DISPUTES

1. Disputes over territorial jurisdiction: This type of dispute results when two or more locals of the same international union have been allotted the right to organize employees within the same community. As a result they may come into conflict. However, this type of dispute is not common because the international union is generally able to force an agreement between its subordinate locals.

2. Trade jurisdiction: Trade jurisdiction is the converse of territorial jurisdiction, inasmuch as the former implies that a union has the right to organize given workers in a particular territory. The assignment of specific trade jurisdiction to one union presumably excludes other unions from seeking to enroll workers performing the same type of work. When two or more subordinate unions of the same international assert that, by reason of the jurisdiction granted them in their charter, each has the right to organize workers performing the same type of work, "a dispute arises which is properly termed a jurisdictional dispute."

3. Demarcation disputes: These usually arise over work which borders on two or more crafts belonging to the same central organization and trades which are closely related. Changes in the methods of machinery frequently furnish a basis for claims of one group against another.

4. Dual union disputes: A dual union is commonly referred to as an organization which claims to maintain itself as an independent body rivaling another organization that has control over the same class of workmen and operates within the same territory. Such unions usually arise as a result of schism within the parent organization.

5. Rival union disputes: These arise from the existence of two central labor organizations. Thus the A. F. of L. and the CIO are frequently in competition for the allegiance of the same group of workers, and they stand ready to assume the representation of workers currently represented by the other. Disputes arising between the CIO and the A. F. of L. have generally been termed "jurisdictional disputes," but strictly speaking they do not fall within this category.

NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS BOARD POLICY

The early policy of the National Labor Relations Board was to refuse to undertake to resolve a jurisdictional dispute between unions affiliated with the same parent organization. In the leading case on this subject (Aluminum Co. of America, 1 N. L. R. B. 580) the Board stated that it "should not interfere with the internal affairs of labor organizations" and that the affairs of the A. F. of L. and its chartered bodies "can best be decided by the parties themselves."

With the advent of the CIO the Board was faced with the question of deciding whether it would handle cases presenting disputes between A. F. of L. unions and CIO unions that were still technically affiliated with the A. F. of L. The Board recognized that the CIO unions had ceased to be under the authority of the A. F. of L., and consequently rejected the contention that the policy it had announced in the Aluminum Co. case was applicable (Interlake Iron Corp. 2 N. L. R. B. 1036).

Present Board practice is to proceed with cases involving representation disputes between two unions affiliated with the same parent organization. This is especially true in situations presenting controversies of long standing between A. F. of L. affiliates, such as the rivalry between the brewery workers and the teamsters and between the printing pressmen and the lithographers. However, the Board does ask the parent organization what steps are being taken to resolve the controversy between its affiliates before proceeding with the case. Presumably if the parent organization advises that it is making efforts to settle the dispute the Board will, at least temporarily, refrain from processing the case.

NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS BOARD POLICY

The United States Bureau of Labor Statistics divides its data concerning so-called jurisdictional strikes into two groups: jurisdictional strikes and rival-union strikes. Although the Bureau has not officially defined these classifications, apparently a jurisdictional strike means a strike resulting from a dispute between two or more unions concerning the right to organize or retain membership in a particular trade or industry. Since the A. F. of L. and the CIO do not recognize jurisdictional boundaries between them, it follows that A. F. of L.-CIO disputes are not included in the Bureau's statistics on jurisdictional strikes. It appears that the Bureau's definition of rival-union disputes includes controversies between two or more unions as to which shall represent a particular group of workers. Thus a rival-union dispute differs from a jurisdictional dispute in that the latter is concerned with claims to jobs or kinds of work; whereas in a rival-union dispute the unions recognize no jurisdictional boundaries between them, but each claims the right to represent the same workers. Of course, the rival-union dispute is not limited to A. F. of L. and CIO controveries but extends to disputes between independent unions and affiliated unions as well.

The following table, prepared from figures compiled by the Bureau of Labor Statistics, shows the total number of strikes, the workers involved, and the man-days of idleness caused by jurisdictional and rival-union strikes:

Jurisdictional and rival union strikes and percent of total for all causes, 1935 to June 1946

REGULATION OF DISCHARGES OVER CLOSED-SHOP CONTRACTS

The proviso to section 8 (3) of the National Labor Relations Act provides that an agreement requiring union membership as a condition of employment shall not be unlawful if the requirement is made pursuant to an agreement with a labor organization not company dominated or assisted, and provided further that the organization is the exclusive representative of the employees in an appropriate bargaining unit at the time the agreement is made. The Board has always construed these provisions narrowly and has insisted that they be met before it would uphold a discharge pursuant to a closed-shop contract.

In recent years the Board has been presented with a number of cases involving closed-shop agreements that have been used in such fashion as to deprive employees of their employment and to prevent them from exercising the right guaranteed them in section 7 of the act—to select collective-bargaining representatives of their own choosing. The usual situation is that employees near the end of their contract term wish to change their representation. However, because the agreement requires membership as a condition of employment, they run the risk of being expelled from membership and consequently being discharged if they engage in any activity designed to oust the contracting union as their representative. It is obvious, therefore, that the closed-shop contract lends itself to the perpetuation of one union as the collective-bargaining representative, and, consequently, deprives employees of the rights guaranteed them by Congress freely to choose and select representatives of their own.

The only remedy presently available to the Board is to proceed against the employer if he knowingly enters into or applies a closed-shop agreement when the contracting union's purpose is to discipline employees who have agitated, at an appropriate time, for a rival organization. No remedy is available against the contracting union. A few leading Board decisions will illustrate the problem.

In the Rutland Court case (44 N. L. R. B. 587, 46 N. L. R. B. 1040) the employer had a closed-shop agreement with union A. Near the end of the contract term the employees became interested in union B and sought to have the employer recognize it as their bargaining representative. Union A, however, expelled the employees from membership and demanded that the employer discharge them pursuant to the closed-shop agreement. The employer had knowledge that union A expelled the employees because they attempted to designate a new representative. Upon charges filed by union B, the Board ordered the employer to reinstate the employees with back pay. The Board stated that effectuation of the policies of the act required "as the life of the collective contract draws to a close that the employees be able to advocate a change in their affiliation without fear of discharge by an employer for so doing."

In the Henri Wines case (44 N. L. R. B. 1310) the majority of the employees applied for membership in a union, thereby designating it as their collective-bargaining representative. An official of the union then negotiated a closed-shop contract with the employer. The union, however, then rejected the membership applications of the employees and thereafter demanded that they be discharged because they were not members. Since the employer entered into the contract with knowledge that the union intended to proceed in this unscrupulous fashion, the Board held that his discharge of the employees constituted an unfair labor practice and accordingly ordered the employees reinstated with back pay.

Probably the most important case is that involving the Wallace Corporation (50 N. L. R. B. 138) which was subsequently affirmed by the United States Supreme Court (323 U. S. 251). In that case the employer entered into a consent election agreement with two contending unions. As a part of that agreement the employer agreed to execute a closed-shop contract with the winning union. The election was won by union A, which then demanded the execution of a closed-shop contract; stating, however, that it intended to use the agreement for the purpose of denying membership to a number of leaders of union B and thereby secure their discharge from employment. Although the employer protested, he nevertheless entered into the contract. Union A then denied membership to a number of employees who had been active in behalf of union B, and their discharge followed. The Board held that the employer had committed an unfair labor practice and rejected the employer's defense that the discharge was permissible under the closed-shop agreement.

The Supreme Court sustained the Board's decision by a 5-to-4 opinion. The majority stated that the authorization of a closed-shop contract in the act could not be taken as an indication of an intention on the part of Congress to authorize a majority of workers and a company, as in this case, to penalize minority groups of workers by depriving them of that full freedom of association and self-organization which it was the prime purpose of the act to protect for all workers.

A necessary condition for granting relief to employees in the foregoing situations is that the employer have knowledge of the purpose to which the closed-shop agreement will be put. If the employer does not have that knowledge or if the Board cannot prove that he had such knowledge, the employees have no remedy under the act as it now stands. In any case, the contract union which expells employees from membership and thereby brings about their discharge from employment is certainly as culpable as the employee who acquiesces in such a program. It seems desirable, therefore, that some remedy should be available against the offending labor organization.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, rationalize it as they attempt to do, labor cannot avoid the indisputable fact that the American people are fed up with the use of economic action in the settlement of jurisdictional disputes; and they are demanding, as they have the right to demand under our democratic system of government, that Congress attempt to do something about it.

I say attempt advisedly because I am none too sure as to how effective and successful any procedure we devise legislatively to handle such a problem will be. However, I am convinced that if it should come to pass that such legislation as we propose to set up for the settling of jurisdictional disputes should not prove to be successful, because of lack of cooperation on the part of labor, the long-time loser will be labor itself. I say that because if legislation were passed that is fair and reasonable, it will not be in the best interest of labor leaders to defy the public will.

It has been an opinion of mine ever since the National Labor Relations Act—known as the Wagner Act—was passed that the act would never prove to be the Magna Carta for labor until it was modified in those respects necessary in order to make the rules applicable to both teams, so to speak. Over the years I have argued many times that the rights and the protection which the Wagner Act gives to labor were long overdue, and that the act was absolutely necessary to protect labor from unfair labor practices of employers; also that it was necessary to check the well known union busting tactics of employers which visited upon us such celebrated cases of labor violence as we witnessed from the 1890's until 1937, and even later, when the act as passed was finally declared constitutional.

In the midst of the present tremendous propaganda drive for punitive labor legislation, it is easy for the American people to forget what has happened in the past—and what is bound to happen again in the future if certain types of employers are freed from the limitations of the Wagner Act. In fact, no one can study the American industrial scene without recognizing that in the competitive struggle for profits it is very easy to treat human beings as commodities to be bought and sold on the labor market on the basis of supply and demand, unless the Government is ever vigilant through such legislation as the Wagner Act, the Fair Labor Standards Act, safety legislation, and all the rest of our very much needed labor legislation, to protect the freedom of free workers.

One cannot sit in the hearings of the Senate Committee on Labor and Public Welfare and listen to the various types of employer witnesses who have come before us without frequently being shocked and disappointed on discovering that there are still many powerful employers in America who believe that the free-enterprise system is synonymous with a benevolent paternalism under which they shall enjoy the license of parceling out the benevolence as best suits their selfish interests. I think it is important that voices be heard in America these days pointing out that there are still many employers who have not learned—or who are not willing to admit—that collective bargaining through the elected representatives of the workers is here to stay; and that if they continue in their drive to tear down the benefits achieved by organized labor they will tear down also the liberties of organized industry and seriously cripple the economy of the Nation.

I am convinced that if today we abolished the Wagner Act within less than 6 months American industrial life would in large part return to the unfair labor practices that existed prior to the passage of the Wagner Act. I see too much evidence of an attitude of union busting and antilabor sentiment in some of the employer witnesses appearing before the Labor Committee not to be convinced that the extremists among American employers are still sufficiently large in number so that the repeal of the Wagner Act would result in another era of labor exploitation that ultimately would lead to tremendous violence and chaos.

When one stops to think about it, that is not a very surprising thing because human nature does not have a tendency to change, especially in the relatively short space of 12 years. Given the economic power they possess and taking into account all the compulsions of competition, it is understandable that too many employers will seek now, as they did in the past, to exploit labor. In consequence, it is my conviction that those of us who recognize that the very survival of political democracy in this country is dependent upon a successful private property economy must resist to the fullest possible extent any attempt to repeal legislation which now keeps American employers from having the license to treat labor as a commodity.

We cannot preserve a political democracy alongside of an employer-industrial dictatorship. The United States of this decade cannot survive as a political Dr. Jekyll and an economic Mr. Hyde—as a political democracy and a laissez-faire economy. Either we are going to march forward as a political and an economic democracy, with a free and cooperative government maintaining only such minimum standards of control as are necessary to protect the economic weak from exploitation by the economic strong, and yet allow free play for American initiative and ingenuity; or we are going to destroy our rights as a democratic people by adopting some form of economic totalitarianism or industrial anarchy.

If we should permit the strangle hold of monopolist practices of big business to continue its death grip upon the throat of private enterprise, we shall develop a form of economic totalitarianism by a relatively few business tyrants in America.

If, coupled with that serious and ominous threat to our free enterprise system, we should repeal or emasculate such pieces of social and labor legislation as the Wagner Act, the Social Security Act, and the Fair Labor Standards Act, we shall succeed only in strengthening the forces of those whose practices and policies—if permitted to go unchecked—would lead to economic totalitarianism in America. Unfortunately the American people are not sufficiently aware of the tremendous revolution that is taking place throughout the world. There is little question about the fact that world economic patterns of the last half century are gone forever.

Private enterprise as we know it in this country and as I want to preserve and strengthen it in this country just does not exist in most of the world today. I see nothing on the international horizon that indicates to me that our American economy is going to be adopted as a model in most of the countries of the world.

There are a great many reasons for that, a discussion of which would be foreign to the purpose of this speech, but nevertheless I feel that this particular facet of the world economic situation should be mentioned and kept in mind as we discuss labor legislation which bears such a vital relationship to our economic system of private enterprise. Economic totalitarianism is the prevailing pattern in most of the countries of the world, and I think leaders of American industry and labor should ponder that fact with a solemnity which I fear does not characterize their present day negotiations and bickerings.

Unfortunately, industry and labor, by their quarrels and frequent displays of bad faith in their negotiations with each other, injure not only themselves but all the rest of us as a people. What is even more important, a continuation of the type of industrial strife that exists in this country today is bound to diminish the influence for good that this Nation can have upon the future.

As we see the British Empire break up before our very eyes in these dramatic days; as we see hunger and want, famine and death stalk the earth—in practically every corner of the earth except this land of ours—we cannot deny what is now a truism, namely, that the one-world concept is not only a political concept but an economic concept as well. We are living in a one world—both politically and economically—whether we will it or not and irrespective of whether we like it or not.

Furthermore, I have no doubt that if we as a people should ever again make the mistake of ignoring or blindly resisting the implications which flow from the reality of the one-world concept, we shall be working against our own best interests. I would that American labor and American industry could grasp the great obligations that our present position in the world places on them. With the world on fire we are being treated to the spectacle of American labor and industry adopting courses of action which are producing tremendous domestic discord within our country, when in fact our national welfare this day calls for a greater national unity on the part of the American people than at any time since Pearl Harbor.

Here we are in the Congress presently devoting our greatest energies to the task of trying to devise legislative procedures which will check the abuses of labor and of industry; trying to devise legislation which will require American labor leaders and employers to live up to the spirit and intent of our Constitutional Bill of Rights. When one stops to think about it, the plight we are in, regarding labor legislation, is a sad reflection upon us as a people. We truly should be ashamed for allowing ourselves to be distracted by these domestic problems which are of such small significance when compared with the great issues of world-wide importance that this Congress in fact should be facing.

Oh, I do not deny the fact that we must render decisions on these domestic issues, and I am ready to suggest what I think some of those decisions should be; but the fact that we have to take legislative cognizance of our labor problems is not a credit to either labor or industry. I am sure that no matter what we pass in this session of Congress, labor will not like it, because apparently it is labor's point of view that to pass anything is going too far. On the other hand, many business and industry groups will not like what we do because in their judgment we will not have gone far enough. Certainly I hope the Congress will not go so far as to satisfy all industry representatives clamoring for restraints on labor.

In reaching my conclusions as to what labor legislation I think should be passed, I have attempted to analyze some of the legislative proposals we have before us, many of which I cannot support.

In the comments I am now about to make on some of the bills upon which we have been hearing testimony I shall confine myself to the most important provisions of those bills which have a direct bearing upon the Wagner Act. Detailed and exhaustive analysis of each of the bills would unduly lengthen this speech. However, I do not wish my silence at this time on some of the provisions of pending bills to be construed as agreement with them.

I turn first to Senate bill 360, introduced by the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. BALL]. We must inquire into what the bill does to the collective-bargaining relationship, because it is an obvious fact—though frequently overlooked—that it is certainly as important today to maintain and insure industrial peace, when 15,000,000 workers are organized, as it was in 1935 when there were only 4,000,000 workers organized.

We should also inquire into what contribution Senate bill 360 or any other bill makes to reward those employers who have accepted collective bargaining and find it a healthy and useful way of dealing with their employees. There are many of these. They far outnumber the articulate minority who wish to return to an outmoded concept of labor relations. Does this bill permit an employer who really wants to give meaning to the rights of his employees to do so without fear that by so doing he will be forced into an untenable competitive position? In other words, is Senate bill 360 one which encourages the employer to sit down with the freely chosen representative of his employees and go to work on things that matter to both of them? Or does it encourage him to destroy this relationship?

Mr. FLANDERS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MORSE. I yield.

Mr. FLANDERS. So that we may follow him more easily, will the Senator kindly give us names in connection with the bills to which he is referring by number?

Mr. MORSE. Senate 360 is the bill introduced by the distinguished Senator from Minnesota [Mr. BALL], setting forth his proposals for amendments to the Wagner Act.

In general Senate bill 360 attempts to do four things: First, by a change in definitions, procedures, and substantive requirements of procedures, to limit and in some cases, abolish, remedies which employees have been customarily granted by the NLRB under the Wagner Act; second, to make available to employers certain newly created procedures; third to reconstitute the National Labor Relations Board by splitting its functions in half and making the Department of Justice responsible for administrative and investigative functions; and fourth, to repeal the Clayton Act of 1914 and the Norris-LaGuardia Act of 1932 in vital respects and thus to make virtually all strikes illegal and subject unions and strikers to injunctions at the instance of employers, to treble damage actions, and to criminal prosecution as well.

By a change in the definition of the term "employee," section 2 (b) (3) of Senate bill 360 not only removes all remedies available to strikers under the Wagner Act; for all practical purposes, it completely destroys the right to strike, one of the most basic in our land, as Lincoln has said. This is accomplished by a simple parenthetical insert, whereby a worker loses his employee status if, while engaging in a strike, he has been replaced or has refused an offer of reinstatement. Even at the common law, employees who were out on strike were still employees. This concept was incorporated in the Wagner Act. The magnitude of the effect of this change can best be illustrated by example.

Let us assume that an employer has been dealing for 15 years with a union as the representative of his employees. There had never been any certification of the representative by the Board, as there has not been in thousands of American plants, because both parties knew that the union represented the men. Management changes, let us assume, and the new management decides to rid itself of the union. It does so by refusing to discuss wages at the time of the expiration of the old contract and the negotiation of a new one. The moment the workers strike, the employer tells all of his employees to come back to work. They refuse. He then brings in strikebreakers. Under S. 360, these strikebreakers are now the only employees of the employer. Those out on strike are mere outsiders with no rights; they cannot even be termed "striking employees," as at the common law. If they continue to strike after the employer has ordered them back to work, then the employer may seek an injunction under section 13 to break the strike. This follows because the dispute is no longer a labor dispute. If a United States conciliator is called, he cannot settle the strike by mediating between the union and the employer, since the union no longer represents a majority of the employees. We would thus, by removing a striker from the concept of employee, do irreparable injury to the collective-bargaining process. As the Senate committee in 1935 stated in its report on the bill which became the Wagner Act, it would be undesirable to withdraw the Government from the field at the very point where the process of collective bargaining has reached a critical stage and where the general public interest has mounted to its highest point."

If the strike was caused by the employer's unfair labor practices, the situation would be even worse under S. 360. If the employer discharged all of the union leaders, physically assaulted them, and told each man to get out of the union or else, those who went out on strike in protest against such conduct could lose their status as employees also, unless they came back to work at the employer's beck and call, regardless of whether the unfair practices were stopped. The Senate committee in 1935, reporting on the Wagner Act said:

> And to hold that a worker who because of an unfair labor practice has been discharged or locked out or gone on strike is no longer an employee, would be to give legal sanction to an illegal act and to deny redress to the individual injured thereby.

Mr. BALL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MORSE. I yield.

Mr. BALL. I think the Senator from Oregon has misread that portion of the section, because the part which leaves a striker still an employee if unemployed because of an unfair labor practice is left as it is under the present law. Under the present Wagner Act if an employee on an economic strike is replaced, according to the present Board's decisions, he is no longer an employee. The situation which concerned me—and I have some doubt as to whether this is the proper answer—is one in which a strike continues, as it has in the Allis-Chalmers plant, for more than a year. That plant is in a small community where there is no possibility of replacement. Yet the union has such a hold that only between a third and a half of the employees have gone back to work. They are disgusted with the strike. A recent election was indecisive because approximately 150 voted for no union. The employees, including those who were still out, voted about 50–50 as between a new union and the one which is certified. The employer is helpless. He can deal only with a union which obviously does not represent the overwhelming employee sentiment. He cannot get the men back to work, and the ones who are working are subject to discrimination by the union which has been certified, if it eventually wins. Somehow or other we must meet the situation which develops when there is a strike which lasts a year or so, and in which obviously the particular union, with its current leadership, will never be able to reach a settlement with the employer.

Mr. MORSE. I shall be very happy to try to work out with the Senator from Minnesota a satisfactory solution. I am trying to point out today that I think the legal effects of the bill which the Senator has introduced will be those which I am setting forth in my speech. I feel that on this point the legal effect of the language of the Senator's bill will make it possible for an employer to break a strike by offering to take the strikers back; and of course when they do not come back, as they will not, unless they can get a fair contract from the employer, under the terms of the Senator's bill they will cease to be employees, and the strike then is of course broken, because the employees will not have any rights under the National Labor Relations Board as it would exist under the provisions of the Senator's bill. That is my legal interpretation of the situation. I am satisfied that when this part of the Senator's bill—if the bill is enacted—goes to the courts in litigation, that is what the courts will find.

Mr. BALL. Does the Senator from Oregon believe that an employer should have no right or opportunity to beat a strike, regardless of the situation which faces him, the demands made upon him, and the attitude of the union?

Mr. MORSE. Not with the aid of Government. Either we must recognize the economic right to strike or lock out, and fight it out on the economic front, or substitute the Government for that economic right. In my judgment, the bill of the Senator from Minnesota would put the Government on the employer's side of the table with such power, as to break a strike if a strike were called. There cannot be the right to strike and the right to lock out without having injuries inflicted. People suffer from the exercise of economic action. I would be the first to admit it. But the point I want to make is that I think the Senator's bill would give the employer the aid of such governmental power under the change of definition of "employee" as found in the bill, that it would be a pretty stupid employer who would not be able to use the bill in such a manner as to defeat any strike.

Mr. BALL. I am inclined to agree that, taken in conjunction with the amendment to section 13 of the act, the bill does go too far and has an effect which I did not foresee when we drafted it. But the Senator speaks of the employers right to lock out as the parallel right to the employees right to strike. It seems to me that that is faulty reasoning, because no employer, in that sense, ever locks out an employee. There are very few cases. The only effective weapon the employer has is to defeat a strike if he thinks it is completely impossible to reach a settlement. I think the Wagner Act, as it has been interpreted, has tended to make it impossible for any employer to defeat a strike, because the bargaining unit continues in perpetuity, so long as the strike lasts. So, all the employers can do is to negotiate with the union. I think the reason we have so many "quickie" strikes is that the unions have not lost a major strike in the last 10 or 12 years, although they should have lost some of them.

Mr. MORSE. I think the Senator from Minnesota is overlooking the fact that in most cases there are both strikes and lock-outs. It is easy to jump to the conclusion that because labor goes out on strike the fault is all that of labor and the action is direct action by labor. It has been my experience in this field that many strikes are an inseparable combination of lock-out on the part of the employer and strike on the part of labor, in the sense that the employer says, "This is it. Take it or else." He thinks he is going to strengthen his position in further negotiations with them or in negotiations with Government agencies. He knows that when men begin to be hungry, when families begin to suffer, he is then in a better position to negotiate a settlement satisfactory to him in termination of a strike.

So my point is that I think it is a mistake, when we see a story in the newspaper about a strike, to think that in any sense it is unilateral. We have got to go back of the strike and find out what led up to it. Frequently it will be found that it was provoked by the employer and that he greatly welcomed direct action on the part of the union, because it permitted him to keep concealed what was also in fact a lock-out as well as a strike.

I wish to say that I appreciate the interruptions which have been made by the Senator from Minnesota, and I shall appreciate having him make other interruptions if he desires to take exception to anything I say in regard to his bill, because I am exceedingly fond of him, as he knows, and I am desirous only of trying to reach some meeting of minds so as to prepare the best possible amendments to the Wagner Act.

I agree with the Senator from Minnesota that the Wagner Act should be amended. I cannot agree with his main pattern of amendment, and hence I am taking this opportunity to express my point of view in regard to his bill. I think it necessary that my point of view regarding his bill be known before I shall be able to make much justification of my attitude with respect to the amendments which I shall offer to the Wagner Act, because in many respects they differ from those of the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. BALL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MORSE. I yield.

Mr. BALL. As I understand the situation now, no matter how long the strike is dragged out, an employer cannot directly communicate with his employees, inviting them to come back to work, without being cited for violation of the act, in that he is required to go through the certified bargaining agent, which means that any proposal he makes must be made through the union, which, of course, has called the strike.

Mr. MORSE. That is in accordance with his contract.

Mr. BALL. But usually, in connection with a major economic strike, the contract has expired. However, it is the law that the union is exclusive bargaining agent, and therefore the employer is held to have violated the law if he has communicated directly with his employees by writing them a letter saying, "Here is our proposal; and if you want to come back to work on it, you can."

Does the Senator think the employer should have that kind of right at some stage in a prolonged strike?

Mr. MORSE. I am sure the senior Senator from Minnesota and the Senator from Oregon are trying to join on one amendment, namely, one restoring to employers in the United States the absolute right of free speech in labor relations cases, so that they shall have the right to communicate with their employees.

Mr. BALL. But what I refer to is more than free speech; it is the right of employers to make direct offers to the employees in connection with the negotiations. As I understand the National Labor Relations Act, it denies that right.

Mr. MORSE. I hope that among the proposals we adopt there will be one giving the employer the right to communicate with his employees.

Mr. BALL. I hope we can accomplish that objective. If we do, we shall accomplish what I seek, namely, the chance for an employer to communicate with his employees. I do not hold with the Senator from Oregon as to the point of view that such communication by an employer will lead to a lock-out in connection with a strike. It seems to me that once the union negotiations have broken down, the employer's counteroffer is not a threat to lock them out. If he says, "anyone may come back to work on these terms," of course, the men may walk out from under the union.

As a rule, it is the union leadership which causes prolonged strikes. Too many times the men themselves get only a distorted version of what has actually been proposed in the course of the negotiations. The purpose of my amendment is to make that union leadership more responsible to the wishes of the majority of the individual employees.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, I wish to make one point regarding a matter which the Senator from Minnesota has been discussing. He pointed out that when a strike is under way and the contract is broken, the employer must still deal with representatives of the union. Of course, that is a part of his obligation under the law; and until it can be shown that the union representatives do not in fact represent the majority of his employees, it seems to me to permit the employer to follow any other course of action than to bargain collectively with those representatives in an endeavor to find some common ground on which they can settle the strike, would destroy a very important right of organized labor, because then there would be a situation in which the employer would have two shots in his gun. First he could take the position, "I simply am not going to renew this contract. I am going to get the employees in a weakened position, first by getting them hungry for a while, after letting them strike." Very frequently that is not at a very great economic loss to the employer. Of course, sometimes a tremendous economic loss to the employer is involved; but usually when the employer uses such strategy he does not feel any great disappointment that the "boys have hit the bricks," so to speak.

The second shot that is in his gun then, if we give him the opportunity or the right to circumvent the elected representatives of his men and to deal with individual employees or with dissident groups or with the nucleus of a company-dominated union which may be springing up in his plant, is that he would be given a chance to kill the union itself by using those devices.

So I think we must find some area of compromise. I think our free-speech amendment will be very helpful, for it will give the employer a chance to carry on his discussions with his men and tell them what his point of view is in regard to what he thinks is the unreasonable position of the union's representatives on various matters, but still it will protect the union by requiring that when the time comes to negotiate the contract, until it can be shown that its representatives do not in fact represent the employees, the contract must be made with them.

Mr. BALL. Mr. President, will the Senator further yield?

Mr. MORSE. I yield.

Mr. BALL. Of course, the Senator from Oregon recalls the testimony in connection with the redwood-lumber industry on the west coast, where a strike has been going on for over a year, I believe. In that connection a witness testified that in his particular company's sawmill—which had employed approximately 250 persons as I recall—although the strike is still going on, they are working full blast, and the sawmill is completely manned, mostly by veterans. Obviously the carpenters' union, which called the strike, does not represent the wishes of the persons now actually working there. Nevertheless, the only way that employer can settle the strike is by dealing with the carpenters' union, which is insisting as one of its grounds of settlement that all the employees now working there be thrown out, and that the persons who originally went on strike, or what are left of them, come in and replace the present employees.

What kind of position does that put the employer in, and whose rights are entitled to be respected—those of the 250 persons now working in the sawmill, or those of the former employees who went on strike, many of whom have now drifted away?

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, I am not in a position to pass on that case. It has been one of the most plaguing cases on the west coast, as the Senator from Minnesota has pointed out, for many months.

Before we can lay down any rule of thumb which should be applied with respect to the rights of employees in that case, I think the Board should have imposed upon it the duty of looking into the merits of the causes of the dispute. If it finds that, after all, the union has followed an entirely unreasonable course of action, and that the employer has kept himself free of unfair labor practices, I think some relief should be given him by a right of petition to have determination made of the question as to who should represent the union.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. MORSE. I am glad to yield.

Mr. TYDINGS. I understood the Senator from Oregon to say in his colloquy with the Senator from Minnesota that after a contract has expired, certain procedures are still mandatory upon the employer because they are in the contract. I think the Senator meant to say they are in the law.

Mr. MORSE. Yes.

Mr. TYDINGS. But I understood the Senator to say that they are in the contract.

Mr. MORSE. I thank the Senator for his observation, because I was referring to the National Labor Relations Act itself.

Mr. TYDINGS. Of course, after the contract had expired, I do not see how the employer could be bound by it.

Mr. MORSE. Yes, that was a slip of the tongue. I meant to say that the National Labor Relations Act itself would require the procedures in question.

I was saying, Mr. President, that in 1935 the Senate committee, in reporting on the Wagner Act, said this:

> And to hold that a worker who because of an unfair labor practice has been discharged or locked out or gone on strike is no longer an employee would be to give legal sanction to an illegal act and to deny redress to the individual injured thereby.

In my judgment, that observation is equally valid today.

I think it would be most difficult to conceive of any kind of strike that could not be made subject to the injunctive procedures of S. 360.

Under the Wagner Act, strikers who are driven to strike because of an employer's illegal conduct have some protection, namely, reinstatement—replacing strikebreakers. They do not—contrary to the assertions of some witnesses before the committee—receive an award of back pay from the Board until they elect to abandon the strike. They do not get back pay for all the time they are on strike. Under S. 360 they have not only lost this measure of protection—they are faced with injunctions. Under the Wagner Act strikers against unfair labor practice can look forward to returning to their jobs after months and even years of litigation; under S. 360 they face immediate sentence to jail in case they wish to exercise their constitutional right of free speech and assembly in furtherance of the strike which the employer himself has caused. To say, as does the draftsman of the bill, that S. 360 does not "impair any rights which workers attained under the Wagner Act," seems to me to tax the credulity of the American workingman. Even if we assume he has not lost a legal right, it is plain that he has lost a vital remedy. It does not matter to the American human being involved whether he has lost rights or remedies; the fact is that he has lost his job and his livelihood in protection of his right to select a representative of his own choosing.

Definitions are not the only method used in S. 360 to deprive employees of remedies. Direct assaults on the substantive provision of the heart of the Wagner Act—section 8—are made. Section 8 (1), forbidding interference and coercion, is amended by forbidding the Board to base any findings of unfair practices on anything an employer says that contains no threat of force or economic reprisal. It seems to me that this provision would deprive the Board of using as evidence, in support of a finding of a discharge for union activity, statements which clearly show motive but are not coercive on their face.

Another change in S. 360—and one which has been opposed by virtually all union representatives and some employer spokesmen who have appeared before the committee—is that repealing the so-called closed-shop proviso in the Wagner Act. All contracts or agreements with labor organizations which make union membership any kind of a condition of employment are, in effect, abolished outright by S. 360. No type of union security provision may hereafter be urged as a defense to a discharge under section 8 (3). Such contracts may still be entered into, but the employer, if he tries to enforce them, will be subject to reinstatement and back-pay proceedings before the Board. By putting this kind of a burden on the employer, indirectly, it is apparently assumed that union security provisions will be abolished.

The arguments for and against the closed shop are many, and, I think, generally familiar to Senators. I do not deny that the closed shop has, in some instances, led to abuses. But I seriously question whether it is any answer to such abuses for the Congress to make it an unfair labor practice for employers to enter into such contracts with unions that are the freely chosen representatives of a majority of the workers before the contract is made.

One of the difficulties, Mr. President, is that too frequently—and I would be one of the first to admit it—it is not known and cannot be established that the representatives who offer the closed shop contract to the employer are in fact the chosen representatives of a majority of his employees. There is too great a tendency for them to walk in before the employer and say, "Sign this—or else," and the employer says, "I do not know whether you represent a single man in my plant," and he is told, in effect, "We do not, either, but that is the contract we are going to insist upon." I hold no brief for such a situation as that.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MORSE. I am glad to yield to the Senator from Maryland.

Mr. TYDINGS. Let us assume that a group of men working in a plant want to have an election to determine what organization, affiliated or unaffiliated with a union, shall represent those who work in that place; let us assume that as a result of the election a certain union wins, or a majority say they want their own local union, unaffiliated with the larger union; let us assume that after that is done there immediately arises an agitation for a new election, although there is no complaint that the first election was not a fair one. Has the Senator given any thought as to how, without taking from the employees the right to reconsider, if they should actually desire to reconsider any vote that theretofore had been taken, they can be protected from actually having to take a vote all over again, when they have just taken one in good faith, and as to which there is no question of fraud?

Mr. MORSE. I have given some consideration to that point, and I hope that amendments I intend to propose later in my speech will cover that situation. I think the Senator from Maryland has raised a hypothetical case which can be resolved only upon the determination of a question of fact, and that therefore jurisdiction must be given to the National Labor Relations Board to take a petition from the employer in order to determine the fact. Take, for instance, the case of employees wanting to reconsider their action. I think the Board should have jurisdiction to order an election for that purpose at appropriate times. In fact, the Board has many times said that a certification is good for a reasonable time, usually 1 year.

Mr. TYDINGS. I have in mind a case where the employees of a concern have had an election, and the question was whether they should belong to a certain union, or should belong to a local union which had no affiliation with large nation-wide unions—a local union which was particularly applicable to the particular plant and locality. Let us assume an election was held, and the overwhelming majority wanted to belong to the local union.

Mr. MORSE. Is the proceeding in question at the expiration of the old contract?

Mr. TYDINGS. Yes; it is. The new contract is made with the local union, but notwithstanding that there is an immediate agitation on the ground that sentiment has changed and it goes on until it reaches the point where a new election is ordered.

In the case I have in mind the employees again vote that they want to be in the local union rather than in the larger union. But even that does not stop the agitation. It begins again, and sometimes it goes on for a year, but it makes no headway, and they ask for still another election.

The point I am making is that it seems to me that when an election is held not only once but twice to decide the same issue, there should be a quiet period of longer duration before another election can be forced upon the employer and employees, which would have a tendency to disrupt and throw out of order all operations. I think that has happened in my own State a couple of times, and that is why I asked the Senator the question.

Mr. MORSE. I think it is more common than that. I think it has happened more than a few times.

Mr. TYDINGS. I think some protection should be thrown around a group of men who, after an issue is thoroughly debated, have made a decision, so that they would not have to make it all over again, and then be confronted a third time with passing on whether they will belong to this, that, or the other union.

Mr. MORSE. I agree with the Senator's observation. It is my understanding that the Board requires that its certifications be observed for a reasonable period, during which it will not entertain a new petition in the absence of unusual circumstances, and further that the courts have sustained this view.

Certainly any proposal seeking to outlaw the closed shop should be carefully weighed and closely examined in the light of industrial-relations experience. In this connection I should like to refer to some data collected by the Department of Labor bearing on this problem.

EXTENT OF THE CLOSED SHOP

An examination by the Industrial Relations Branch in 1945 on the extent of collective bargaining (Bulletin 865) of the Department of Labor indicated that approximately 30 percent of the workers under agreement were covered by the closed shop. The closed shop (and union shop, with preferential hiring, which is equivalent to the closed shop) prevails in the following manufacturing industries: Baking, brewery, canned and preserved foods, hosiery, men's and women's clothing, printing and publishing, and shipbuilding. An examination of the number of workers covered by the closed shop will give some idea of the possible impact of the outlawing of closed shop provisions on existing collective bargaining agreements. A study prepared by the Bureau in 1939 indicates that more than one-half of the 7,000 agreements on file with the Bureau, and current at that time, contained provisions requiring that all employees be members of the union. The estimate at that time was that approximately 3,000,000 of the nearly 8,000,000 organized workers in the United States were working under closed shop conditions.

THE CLOSED SHOP IN RELATION TO MAJOR DISPUTES IN 1946

Detailed statistical information for the full year 1946 on major issues involved in work stoppages is not yet available. For the year 1945 see Department of Labor Bulletin No. 878. The closed or union shop, and the closed or union shop combined with wages and/or hours, were relatively minor as issues in dispute in work stoppages during the year 1945. The closed or union shop, as a major issue, was involved in only 126 work stoppages, affecting 57,700 workers, and responsible for only 1.9 percent of the total man-days of idleness. Issues in which wages and/or hours were involved, as well as the closed or union shop, accounted for an additional 90 stoppages, involving 40,700 workers and accounting for 2.6 percent of total man-days of idleness for the year. The information for the year 1946 is available in a limited form for the first 6 months. The closed or union shop was involved in 37 stoppages and affected 5,680 workers; the closed or union shop combined with wages/or hours accounted for 170 stoppages and affected some 79,300 workers.

A review of the major labor-management disputes in 1946 indicates that there were 29 stoppages which began during the year, each of which directly involved 10,000 or more workers. These stoppages affected 2,900,000 workers and resulted in 66,190,000 man-days of idleness. The total man-days of idleness reported for all work stoppages which began in 1946 was 95,690,000.

An examination of the more detailed statement below indicates that none of the major strikes originating in 1946 would have been avoided had the existing legislation on the closed shop been passed. In only 4 of the 29 stoppages, which accounted for approximately 1 percent of the total man-days lost, were there predominantly closed-shop industries involved, and in all four of these instances the major issue was the question of wages. It can, of course, be argued that had existing closed-shop legislation been passed there might well have been strikes as the result of the legislation itself. Statements submitted to the Senate and House Labor Committees would seem to indicate that there might well be serious labor-management disputes if the closed shop were outlawed.

Of the man-days idle resulting from the 29 major strikes originating in 1946, 96 percent resulted from disputes in which the major issue was wages, and almost 4 percent—3.8—from disputes in which wages and some form of union security were involved. The distribution of the 29 major strikes originating in 1946, by major issue and man-days idle, is given below.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have published at this point in my remarks a table setting forth that data.

There being no objection, the table was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Major issue	Number of stoppages	Number of man-days idle
Wages	21	63,500,000
Wages and union security	3	2,500,000
Union recognition	2	120,000
Other (protest over discharge, seniority rules; vacation pay for veterans)	3	70,000
Total	29	66,190,000

Only 4 of the 29 stoppages involved industries predominantly closed shop but in all of these the only issue involved was wages:

Industry:	Man-days idle
Building construction:
Cincinnati	12,000
Buffalo	162,000
Cuyahoga, Geauga, and Lake Counties, Ohio	48,000
Trucking companies: NYC area and northern New Jersey	487,000

Mr. MORSE. The total of 709,000 man-days idle resulting from these four strikes in closed-shop industries accounted for 1 percent of the total man-days lost as a result of the 29 major stoppages.

Mr. President, in order to save time, I ask unanimous consent to have published at this point in my remarks another table under the heading "Approximate number of workers covered in 1945 by closed shop and union shop with preferential hiring."

There being no objection, the table was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Approximate number of workers covered in 1945 by closed shop and union shop with preferential hiring

MANUFACTURING

Industry	Closed shop	Union shop with preferential hiring
Food	200,000	125,000
Tobacco	7,000
Textiles	16,000	78,000
Apparel	380,000	198,000
Lumber	12,000	44,000
Furniture and finished lumber	25,000	13,000
Paper and allied products		12,000
Printing and publishing	200,000
Chemicals	2,000	2,000
Petroleum and coal	1,000
Rubber		2,000
Leather	20,000	40,000
Stone, clay, and glass	20,000	25,000
Iron and steel	30,000	20,000
Nonferrous metals	22,000	10,000
Electrical machinery	13,000	6,000
Machinery, excluding electrical	7,000	49,000
Automobiles	2,000	1,000
Transportation equipment	313,000	79,000
Miscellaneous	16,000	9,000
Total	1,286,000	713,000

In 1945 there were approximately 2,000,000 nonmanufacturing workers under closed-shop provisions and 19,000 under union shop with preferential hiring. Included in this group are employees in construction, trucking, warehousing, services, clerical, sales and professional occupations, mining, transportation, communications and public utilities. For manufacturing and nonmanufacturing together there are about 3,500,000 workers under closed shop and about 750,000 workers under union shop with preferential hiring.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, what does S. 360 do to the duty to bargain collectively? Section 8 (5) of the Wagner Act has always been thought of as one requiring employers to bargain in good faith. Usually the test of this formula was the making of counterproposals. As Chairman Herzog explained in detail to the committee, concessions are not necessary; neither are agreements. But an open mind, ready and willing to discuss in good faith, is necessary. S. 360 would only require meetings for the purpose of conferring. It does not even require that the employer actually confer. All he has to do is to sit and listen.

Mr. President, over the years I have watched the technicians and the literalists on both sides of the collective-bargaining table, and I have noted that they are always fast on the trigger when it comes to shooting at the literal meaning of either a law or a decision or a contract. There are employers that will say, "I met for the purpose of conferring, and that is all the law says I have to do."

Mr. CAPEHART. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MORSE. I yield.

Mr. CAPEHART. I was wondering if the able Senator from Oregon believes in collective bargaining for political parties. I mean by that, does the Senator believe that Republican or the Democratic Party caucuses should be held, with a majority vote binding the party?

Mr. MORSE. If I have not made my position perfectly clear to the Senator from Indiana, let me do so now: Here is one Republican who will never be bound by any vote taken in a Republican caucus in the Senate of the United States.

Mr. CAPEHART. Am I to understand the Senator to mean that if he were a member of a union, he would refuse to be bound by the collective-bargaining agreement and would refuse to join a closed shop?

Mr. MORSE. Not if I were a member of a union; but I think it is rather novel for the Senator from Indiana to inject into this discussion the idea that the Republican Party is a union.

Mr. CAPEHART. We are employees of the people, and we hold a responsibility for the success of the party as a whole. I was merely wondering why the same collective-bargaining principle would not apply to a political party. If it is a good thing for the workers, it certainly should be a good thing for the politicians.

Mr. MORSE. The reason why that does not hold is because the situations have not elements in common which would make the analogy applicable. I am sure the Senator from Indiana knows that, but I am happy to let him have his fun.

Mr. AIKEN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MORSE. I yield.

Mr. AIKEN. Is it not a fact the Members of Congress are employees of the Government? Has the Senator from Oregon advocated collective bargaining between the Government and its employees yet?

Mr. CAPEHART. Does not the able Senator from Vermont agree with me that a member of a party owes some responsibility to the party, and that he is part and parcel of the party?

Mr. MORSE. The Senator from Oregon agrees with the Senator from Indiana on that.

Mr. CAPEHART. And does the Senator agree that he should be bound by a majority of votes of the party? Is not that collective bargaining? Is not that the principle of trade unionism?

Mr. MORSE. It is the last statement of the Senator from Indiana with which the junior Senator from Oregon does not agree. But I may say to the Senator from Indiana that, in order to show his appreciation of the responsibility of individual members of a party to the party, in the 1946 elections the junior Senator from Oregon campaigned, as I believe the count will show, in about 15 States.

Mr. CAPEHART. I do not question that.

Mr. MORSE. Let me finish the sentence. And the junior Senator from Oregon did so because he was a member of the elections committee of the Republican Party of the United States Senate. In 1948 he will be campaigning for the party again. But he is not going to take the position that because he is a Republican Member of the Senate he must vote on issues contrary to his convictions; nor is he going to let the chairman of the National Republican Committee, even by a cleverly worded editorial, indicate that when a Member of the Senate does not take orders from the so-called Republican quarterbacks he is committing an offense against the Republican Party. I hope we have not reached the time in American politics when a member of the Republican Party cannot stand on the floor of the Senate for his principles, and vote in keeping with his convictions.

Mr. CAPEHART. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MORSE. I am glad to yield.

Mr. CAPEHART. I should like to say that I hope we have not arrived at the point in the United States when a man in order to obtain work must join a union, and in order to hold a job must join a union. I hope likewise we have not arrived at a point in the Senate when a man must follow the dictates of his party, but I say that there is a parallel between what I am trying to state and a caucus, or collective bargaining, in the Senate or in a party.

If the able Senator from Oregon belonged to a union he would be denied the rights that he is given in the Senate and that are accorded him by the Republican Party. I say that the able Senator from Oregon would not make a good union member, because he is an individualist; he wants to say what he pleases, when he pleases, and to work for whomsoever he pleases. If he were a member of a union, today he would be unable to do that, and, unless he joined a union, in literally thousands and thousands of shops in America today, the Senator would not be able to secure a job.

I hope the time has not arrived, likewise, when a man within the United States must join a union in order to be able to obtain work. When that time arrives, then, in my opinion, we shall have arrived at a time when we have given up our liberty and our freedom.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, I shall do everything I can to see to it that the Senator from Indiana shall have the right to vote whatever views he cares to within the Republican Party, and I appreciate the fact that by implication at least he admits I should have the same right.

What does Senate bill 360 do about the duty to bargain collectively? Before the last colloquy took place I stated that under the provisions of S. 360 there is the duty on the part of the employer to meet for the purpose of conferring, and I was suggesting that I thought a great many employers not particularly sympathetic with organized labor would be literalists with regard to that language. The language does not even require that the employer actually confer. All he has to do is to sit and listen. Bargaining thus becomes a sham. A recalcitrant employer leaves the union with no choice except to strike. This results in a strange situation, indeed. If the employer refuses to meet at all, the Board may find an unfair labor practice. The results of striking against this conduct are, as pointed out above, perilous. And yet if the employees do go to the Board, all the Board can do after a hearing and enforcement in the circuit court of its order, is to require the employer to meet, which is hardly any inducement to offer the employees in return for subjection to such a cumbersome and lengthy procedure. A strike with all of the perils present and risks involved, is more likely to appear to achieve the desired effect—genuine collective bargaining.

If, somehow, in spite of S. 360, a collective-bargaining agreement is reached, more peril is in store for the union as the representative of the employees. Although its agreement covers all employees within the unit, S. 360, unlike the Wagner Act, permits individuals or minority unions to make side deals with the employer, without the participation of the exclusive bargaining agent, which might well undermine the representative position of such a union.

This is not an exhaustive picture of all of the remedies limited or abolished by S. 360. However, it can be seen, in summary, that substantial parts of the heart of the Wagner Act are gone. So, also, are all methods of union security and an effective right to strike. What is left, the Board may still enforce, with such powers as remain in its hands after it has been split in two, deprived of much of its assistance from its staff, and subjected to more rigid control from the Circuit Court of Appeals.

Only a shell of the original Wagner Act is left and a badly cracked shell at that in the form of S. 360. I would call S. 360 an attempt to repeal the Wagner Act by emasculation. Antiunion employers who are advocating the outright repeal of the Wagner Act can accomplish to all intents and purposes their objectives by working for the passage of S. 360. Effective protection of American workers through law from the unfair labor practices of employers will be destroyed if S. 360 becomes law. Do we want to go back to employer tactics that were exercised with impunity before the Wagner Act was passed in 1935? If anyone really thinks that such a step backward will produce labor peace in America the events which will follow the passage of S. 360 will prove him dead wrong.

S. 360 has been greeted by some as a new charter of rights for employers. It has been assumed that it equalizes the Wagner Act. These statements should be carefully examined and the practical effects thoroughly analyzed.

Under S. 360 employers may, as they cannot now under the NLRB's regulations, petition the Board for an election if they have been presented with a claim to be recognized by a labor organization claiming to be the representative of a majority of employees within a particular unit. I do not oppose this change, in principle, and shall later on in this speech offer a provision along the same lines.

S. 360 permits employers to file charges against labor organizations or their agents for: First, interfering with, restraining, or coercing employees in the exercise of their rights guaranteed in section 7; and second, refusing to bargain collectively with an employer, provided it is the majority representative of his employees. Here, again, I am in general agreement, except that I think much of the so-called coercion by unions of workers can more effectively be handled at the State level, rather than making a national police court of the National Labor Relations Board.

Another major change effected by S. 360 is that relating to separation of functions. Under the National Labor Relations Act the Board is made the exclusive agency for the enforcement of the act. It is charged with the exclusive responsibility for administering that law, from the investigation, trial, and decision of cases to the institution of enforcement proceedings in the courts. It is now proposed, however, to divide this responsibility between the Department of Justice and the Board by transferring to a division of the Department of Justice the duty and responsibility for administering all phases of the act except hearing and deciding cases which the Department determines to institute.

I am opposed to this proposal for three reasons: First, because I believe it would result in a complete break-down of administration of the act and protection of the legitimate rights of labor under the act; second, because I am convinced that the separation of functions proposed is entirely unnecessary to protect private parties who appear before the Board against abuses; and, third, because I believe the proposal unfairly singles out the Board among all the Government agencies for special treatment and separation.

I may say, Mr. President, that this is one of the most difficult subjects with which I have tried to wrestle, not only so far as the National Labor Relations Board is concerned but as concerns procedure under administrative law machinery. I strongly believe that in executive agencies there must be a separation of the so-called judicial function from administrative and prosecuting functions. For a time I worked on a proposed amendment, which I finally discarded, to set up an administrative director of the National Labor Relations Board under whose office all questions of administration and prosecution would come. Why did I discard it? I did so because I found I had committed an error which I am suspicious other Members of the Senate may have committed. It was an error of not giving due consideration to the Administrative Procedure Act which was passed in the Seventy-ninth Congress; for when I took that act and proceeded to study the actual reforms conviction of mine about what ought to be done with the Wagner Act. At brought about in connection with the separation of powers within our Administrative law tribunals, I had to throw away what had up to that time been a least I had to take the position, in all fairness, that the bill which was passed last year ought to be given a trial. I think we now must have proof that the main objective which we had in mind, namely the separation of judicial and prosecuting functions was not accomplished by the law we have already put on the books.

That law has had an interesting history. It was considered by the Administrative Law Committee of the Attorney General when Mr. Justice Jackson was Attorney General. Members of the Senate will find an excellent report which was prepared after long study and work by the Attorney General's committee. The principles of that report in the main were enacted into law by the Seventy-ninth Congress in the Senate, under the able leadership of the great Senator from Nevada [Mr. MCCARRAN].

Furthermore, over the years the American Bar Association Committee on Administrative Law Procedure has worked on the subject. The findings of that committee on the question of separation of functions were incorporated in principle in the law which we passed last year. The consensus of opinion of the great lawyers who have worked during the years on this problem is that the law which we passed on their recommendation should be applied to all administrative law tribunals. That is why I say that my third reason is that I believe it would be unfair to single out the National Labor Relations Board among all the Government agencies that deal in the field of administrative law, and say that this is the one and only agency which ought to receive different treatment. I am making these statements because I want the RECORD to show my explanation as to why I have changed a previously held opinion on this subject. I hope I shall never reach the point where I cannot be convinced by the facts and the law that my position on any issue is erroneous. At least I have been sufficiently convinced on this point to satisfy me that we ought to put to trial the Administrative Law Procedure Act passed by the Seventy-ninth Congress before we adopt such a proposal as is made in Senate bill 360, whereby a part of the functions would be transferred entirely to the Department of Justice.

The serious disadvantages of a dispersion of authority and responsibility for administering the National Labor Relations Act seem almost too clear for argument. Instead of one agency charged with making and executing the policy, we would have two. Obviously, both would have to be sympathetic to the basic purposes of Congress announced in the act. Both would have to be familiar with the numerous economic, social, and legal problems which a law protecting self-organization and collective bargaining raises. And both would have to have the specialized knowledge and special training which these problems require to handle them. Otherwise, there would inevitably be constant friction and application of divergent policies between them.

The Department of Justice, however, is the law office of the Nation. It is not a body of labor relations experts. To require it to take over the functions of labor relations experts and to absorb into its personnel field examiners and labor relations specialists now employed by the Board, very few of whom are lawyers and none of whom are required to be lawyers, would change its whole character and complexion.

But even if we assume that the Department of Justice could be adequately staffed and organized to assume these novel functions that are wholly foreign to its true character and business, the consequences of the dispersion of responsibility for administering the act would still be tragic, in my opinion. The Department of Justice, for example, might adopt one policy for dealing with the problem of raiding by unions. The Board, on the other hand, might adopt a different policy. Or the Department of Justice might adopt a policy for handling and discouraging stale and harassing charges, whereas the Board might prefer a different policy. Inevitably there would be pulling and hauling between the two.

Moreover, cease and desist and other orders which the Board issues are not self-executing. There are no sanctions which they carry to compel obedience to them until a circuit court of appeals reviews and enforces them. But the Board would have no control over the institution of proceedings for enforcement of its orders. Instead, the Department of Justice would decide in each case whether or not the order should be enforced. Accordingly, Board orders which the Board might regard as very important would be completely meaningless and unenforced unless the Department of Justice agrees with the remedy the Board had ordered and that the case was one which should be pressed in the courts. This would leave final enforcement of the statute entirely to the Department of Justice and not to the Board.

There would also be other serious disadvantages, I believe, not only to the public, but to private interests. The Board would not be able, for example, to prevent the institution and trial of cases which it knows in advance it will surely dismiss. If only to save itself time and money, the present Board will not permit such cases to be pressed today. Moreover, private parties will be less likely to accept informal settlement of cases and will prefer to litigate them if the settlement negotiations are with prosecutors who cannot turn to the Board for the applicable policy. Board statistics, it seems to me, are very illuminating on this score. These show that less than 15 percent of the cases filed ever go to formal complaint, hearing, or adjudication by the Board. Under the division of functions, however, many more of these cases would certainly be litigated because there could not be the same sure sifting and weeding process applied to the cases. The result would be more delays, intolerable to employers and unions, added governmental expense at a time when we are making every effort to economize, and unnecessary harassment of private parties by litigation which could be wholly avoided if there were a coordinated policy.

These advantages of a single coordinated responsibility for administration over dispersed and dual responsibility are not hypothetical. Congress had had experience with both kinds of administration when in 1935, in enacting the National Labor Relations Act, it deliberately selected the single coordinated type of administration. Congress had before it at that time the wholly satisfactory experience of other administrative tribunals, notably the Interstate Commerce Commission and the Federal Trade Commission, which had a single unified system of administration. Congress also had before it the experience under the NRA, where court enforcement was obtained through the Department of Justice. That experience showed that only one suit was brought out of 33 referred to the Department of Justice for enforcement. It led Chairman Biddle to testify—

> The system under which we are working and the machinery under which we are trying to enforce the law makes inevitable the break-down of legal enforcement—

And that—

> the division of responsibility creates chaos. (Testimony of Chairman Biddle before Senate Committee on Education and Labor, holding hearings on S. 1958, 74th Cong., 1st sess., pp. 93–95.)

Congress then, wisely as I believe, decided "to dispel the confusion resulting from dispersion of authority and to establish a single paramount administrative or quasijudicial authority"—report of Senate Committee on Education and Labor on Senate bill 1958, Seventy-fourth Congress, first session, page 15. See also pages 5, 8, 14–15. It seems clear to me that every reason for making that decision then applies just as fully today.

The second basic reason for my opposition to the proposal to bifurcate the Board is my conviction that such a separation is entirely unnecessary to protect the rights of parties before the Board.

The Board, like other similar administrative agencies is, of course, subject to the provisions of the Administrative Procedure Act of 1946. This act is the culmination of more than 10 years of the most intensive and well-informed study of the operations and procedures of administrative agencies, including the National Labor Relations Board. These studies and proposals were made and conducted in the executive department of the Government, the legislative department, before many congressional committees, by organizations such as the American Bar Association, and by many private practitioners and students of the subject. One of the sponsors of the legislation, Mr. Carl McFarland, chairman of the American Bar Association's special committee on administrative law—see Legislative History of the Administrative Procedure Act, Senate Document No. 248, page 79—described this very problem of the separation of functions as the subject that had evoked most comment, criticism, and study. Upon the basis of these careful and informed studies and proposals from every quarter, including proposals for complete separation of agencies, the Congress recognized the inherent administrative difficulties which would result from a complete separation and it deliberately selected a different method for safeguarding the rights of parties against the abuses which might flow from mingling functions—statement of Senator McCarran, chairman of the Senate Committee on the Judiciary, discussing the Administrative Procedure Act on the floor of the Senate, Legislative History of Administrative Procedure Act, Senate Document No. 248, page 299.

The scheme of separation of functions which Congress enacted last year in the Administrative Procedure Act is applicable to the Board and to all other agencies. Its provisions adequately "assure that no investigating or prosecuting officer shall directly or indirectly in any manner influence or control the operations of hearing and deciding officers, except as a participant in public proceedings, and even then in no different fashion than the private parties or their representatives"—Senate Document No. 248, pages 262, 203. The plan of protection includes, in general, provisions for detailed and carefully thought-out basic procedures for the conduct of hearings and formulation of decisions.

There is also required a complete separation within each agency, including the Board, of all persons who participate or have anything to do with investigating and trying cases and persons who participate in or are consulted about the decision of cases. Hearing officers are also given a more important status. Instead of merely sitting to conduct a hearing and receive evidence, the Procedure Act requires that these hearing officers make either the initial or recommended decision of the cases in which they preside, and the new law insures that these decisions shall reflect the examiners' genuinely independent views by providing new and very specific machinery for their independence and security of tenure and salary during good behavior. This enhanced status and security is protected by the Civil Service Commission and is made independent of the recommendations or rating of the particular Government agencies to which the trial examiners might be attached. See sections 5 (c) and 11 of the Administrative Procedure Act; statement of Senator McCarran, Legislative History of Administrative Procedure Act, Senate Document No. 248, pages 299, 327; reports of Senate and House Committees on the Judiciary, pages 193, 246.

In this way, it was agreed on both sides of this Chamber, private litigants would be fully protected against abuses and unfair, biased decisions in administrative agencies and, at the same time, the serious difficulties which would flow from a complete separation of the agencies would be avoided. We should not throw into the scrap heap this carefully approved and prepared scheme which was universally acclaimed in all quarters as a correct solution less than 1 year ago. I think it should be given ample opportunity to demonstrate whether the problems which have confronted us with regard to the separation of judicial and prosecuting functions of all our administrative agencies, the National Labor Relations Board included, will be solved by the Administrative Procedure Act.

Following the enactment of the Administrative Procedure Act the Board carefully reexamined its practices and procedures and issued revised rules and regulations designed to put them in full compliance with the letter and spirit of the new law. Certain changes were made. These changes were presented and discussed at a meeting with the leading attorneys from all parts of the country, including representatives of the National Association of Manufacturers, the United States Chamber of Commerce, the American Federation of Labor, the CIO, independent unions, and private firms of attorneys who frequently have business with the Board. No substantial complaints have been heard regarding the Board's procedures in so far as separation of functions is concerned.

Let us examine briefly these procedures of the Board, which unquestionably comply with the Administrative Procedure Act and fully protect private parties. Investigations and the trial of cases are handled by regional offices, far from the Board's central office in Washington, almost entirely on an autonomous and independent basis. If advice is desired as to hearing or trial procedure, special units of the field and legal divisions consider and give such advice. Where advice as to formal procedures is required, a special committee consisting of the Director of the Field Division and the Associate General Counsel in charge of field legal operations responds. None of these persons has anything to do with the decision of cases or with the supervision or control over Board personnel who have anything to do with the decision of cases.

The hearing of cases is conducted before trial examiners who constitute a special autonomous division of the Board under the direction and supervision of a Chief Trial Examiner. The Chief Trial Examiner is responsible directly to the Board and to no one else, and the findings of the trial examiners in unfair-labor-practice cases where they preside are normally adopted as the final Board decision unless one of the parties to the proceeding files exceptions which are found clearly to have merit. The Board is assisted in the decision of cases by a group of attorneys who operate as a general pool of law clerks to the Board members. These attorneys are completely separated from personnel who have anything to do with the investigation and prosecution of cases, and they have no other function except to assist the Board in reviewing records.

These procedures seem more than adequate to insure the Board's bringing to the decisional process an impartial and dispassionate judgment free from the predispositions which the performance of investigations and advocacy might produce.

Finally, I am opposed to the proposed transfer of functions of the Board to the Department of Justice because I believe it unfairly singles out the Board for special treatment. I confess to a native sense of fairness which finds it repugnant to select the Board, without good reason, as the single pariah in whom, alone, of all the Government agencies, the mingling of functions operates to the prejudice of respondents. In view of the uniform application of the Administrative Procedure Act to all agencies, including the Board, and the clear compliance of the Board with its requirements, a claim that the combination of functions in a single agency is contrary to principles of justice can, for me, have no more pertinency to the Board than it has to the Interstate Commerce Commission, the Federal Trade Commission, the Securities and Exchange Commission, and similar administrative bodies. Yet no one, so far as I know, has seriously suggested the cleavage of these other agencies.

Under the Administrative Procedure Act, moreover, the procedures of all these agencies are made subject to the same basic requirements. They are all now subject to the same uniform system of administrative procedure and judicial review. I remember that on the floor of the Senate during the Seventy-ninth Congress a group of us fought for the establishment of the substantial-evidence rule in the act, and we were successful in having included in the act all agencies, including the National Labor Relations Board itself.

Under that law it is recognized that good practices for one agency are likewise good practices for other agencies that perform similar functions and have similar duties and responsibilities. Congress deliberately rejected all efforts to give special treatment to any agency. To me, this not only makes good common sense, but it seems the essence of fairness and uniform treatment.

If the Board and the procedures of the National Labor Relations Act are to have the confidence and respect of the public and the courts, which they must have, to operate effectively; if workingmen and their unions are to believe that their basic rights of self-organization and collective bargaining are protected and that self-help and strikes are unnecessary to achieve these rights; if the country is to know that we are not intent upon stifling these legitimate rights and aspirations of working people but that we mean only to correct abuses, not to create new injustices, we cannot afford to single out and remove from the general law and scheme of procedures applicable to all other agencies the one agency which deals with and is intended to protect these basic rights of labor.

Before concluding my remarks on Senate bill 360, I feel it necessary to refer to its impact upon the Clayton Act and the Norris-LaGuardia Act. I have previously referred to the effect of Senate bill 360 on the right to strike. As amended by Senate bill 360, section 13 of the Wagner Act would make any strike, an objective of which is to compel an employer to, first, bargain collectively with a labor organization or other person not certified as the representative of his employees under section 9; second, to remedy practices for which an administrative remedy is available under this act; or third, to violate a provision of this act or some other law of the United States unlawful and not protected by the immunities of sections 6 and 20 of the Clayton Act and not a labor dispute within the meaning of the Norris-LaGuardia Act.

The Norris-LaGuardia Act is an act limiting the jurisdiction of Federal courts sitting in equity in issuing injunction in labor disputes or in issues growing out of or involving a labor dispute. If a labor dispute is not in the picture, the act does not apply. Courts are then free to issue injunctions in the old-fashioned way. The Norris-LaGuardia Act provides that where a labor dispute is involved, courts can issue injunctions only under very specific conditions, after a procedure involving a hearing and the making of specific findings, and only in aid of an employer who has used every reasonable effort to settle the controversy and has complied with all of his legal obligations. The act also limits Federal equity judges in the form their decrees take and as to the specific action their decrees may restrain. Lastly, on trials for contempt of such decree, the defendant is entitled to a jury trial.

Section 6 of the Clayton Act provides as follows:

> That the labor of a human being is not a commodity or article of commerce. Nothing contained in the antitrust laws shall be construed to forbid the existence and operation of labor, agricultural, or horticultural organizations, instituted for the purposes of mutual help, and not having capital stock or conducted for profit, or to forbid or restrain individual members of such organizations from lawfully carrying out the legitimate objects thereof; nor shall such organizations, or the members thereof, be held or construed to be illegal combinations or conspiracies in restraint of trade under the antitrust laws.

Section 20 of the Clayton Act is a modified form of the Norris-LaGuardia Act, but is not so broad as the Norris-LaGuardia Act. It provides that United States district courts may not issue injunctions in cases growing out of disputes between employers and employees which enjoin the ceasing of work, peaceful persuasion, peaceful assembly, giving of strike benefits, "or from any act which might lawfully be done in the absence of such dispute by any party thereto."

These are the acts repealed by section 13 of the Wagner Act, as amended by Senate bill 360. If Senate bill 360 becomes law, there will be no reason why the various district courts cannot enjoin practically all types of activity in support of any strike. If the strike is not one for a remedy provided by the Board, the strike—because the strikers have lost their employee status—becomes one to force an employer to recognize a union no longer representing the employees.

Without the provisions of the Norris-LaGuardia Act, district judges will have power to decree what workers can say on the picket lines, what expressions they shall have on their faces when they speak to nonstrikers, where and how many of them can assemble together, the purpose of such assembly, and the number of such pickets, and so forth.

The right of trial by jury, thought by most Americans to be one of their basic rights, is not guaranteed in injunction cases. Violation of a decree is punishable by contempt, before a judge without a jury.

The repeal of section 6 of the Clayton Act means that labor is again a commodity. The concept that it was not, fought for over many years, led Samuel Gompers to characterize the words of section 6 as "hammer blows to the wrongs and injustices" so long inflicted upon the workers. If we repudiate the Clayton Act, the Norris-LaGuardia Act, and most of the Wagner Act, we shall have come full circle—back to 1912 and even further.

Another labor bill now pending before the Senate and upon which I wish to make a few remarks, is Senate bill 133, which seeks to prevent industry-wide collective bargaining. I do not propose to enter upon a detailed analysis of the bill at this time, but I wish to make clear on the RECORD, for future reference, that I think passage of this bill would be very disruptive of labor relations of this country along a good many fronts. I think it represents again a legislative attempt to destroy a proper right because of instances in which the exercising of this right has been abused. A false analogy is being drawn by the proponents of this bill between monopoly in business and alleged monoply in labor relations through industry-wide bargaining.

I have been unable to see anything common between monopolistic practices of big business where powerful business combines secure control of the supply or means of production of certain goods and then set up economic dictatorship over the prices that are to be charged for those goods and the terms and circumstances under which they are to be produced both as to quantity and quality, and, on the other hand, free collective-bargaining practices of unions and associations of employers whereby under master contracts, they work out an agreement covering wages, hours, and conditions of employment for the plants owned by the employer members of the association. Sometimes the contracts cover practically an entire industry, sometimes only a small segment of it, as I shall point out later. So-called industry-wide or multi-employer collective bargaining takes on a variety of forms; but to allege that such open and aboveboard free collective bargaining within the law, subject to all the checks of the Wagner Act, constitutes anything that even resembles monopoly, is very difficult for me to see.

I think it is very important that multi-employer collective bargaining with a union or a group of unions should not be binding upon any employers who are not members of the employers' association. It will be seen from the amendments to the Wagner Act which I am introducing today that I make very clear that employers not members of such associations shall not be bound by any so-called master contract to which they are not a party or to which they do not subsequently, through collective bargaining, voluntarily agree. I think the Members of the Senate need to analyze some pertinent facts concerning the extent of so-called industry-wide bargaining and the way it actually functions in practice before they jump to the conclusion that anything needs to be done about it as destructive as is proposed in Senate bill 133.

My years of work in the field of labor relations have taught me one thing, if they have not taught me anything else, and that is to make certain as to whether charges that are made against labor and employers in regard to any of their practices can be substantiated in fact, or whether they represent only motivations of prejudice and a desire to weaken the effectiveness of legitimate unionism and employer rights and, in this instance, employer rights to bargain with labor as a group.

Hence, a few weeks ago I wrote to the Secretary of Labor a letter asking him for assistance, through his staff, in collecting some objective data on various types of industry-wide bargaining and the extent to which it exists in this country. On January 24 he replied to my letter, in his usual fine, cooperative manner, by informing me that he had asked Mr. Boris Stern, of the Industrial Relations Branch of the Department of Labor, to compile the data for which I had asked.

I should like, Mr. President, to have incorporated in the RECORD as a part of my remarks at this point the letter which I received from Secretary Schwellenbach.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF LABOR,
Washington, January 24, 1947.

The Honorable WAYNE MORSE,
United States Senate,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR MORSE: Immediately upon receipt of your letter of January 17, we checked with the Bureau of Labor Statistics and found that the Industrial Relations Branch of the Bureau, under the direction of Mr. Boris Stern, has already prepared some material on Nation-wide and multicompany collective bargaining, which may prove useful to you. The material, however, is available in very rough form and I am suggesting that, at your discretion, Mr. Stern, whom you no doubt know, bring it to you personally, with the view of letting you have such parts of the data as you may need immediately, or, if necessary, prepare the material in a form most useful for your purposes.

I hope this approach will prove entirely satisfactory to you.

Sincerely yours,

L. B. SCHWELLENBACH.

Mr. MORSE. I feel, Mr. President, that not only I but every other Member of the Senate is indebted to the Secretary of Labor and to Mr. Boris Stern for the excellent work which has been done for us in compiling some very helpful information on industry-wide collective bargaining. I think each Senator should study this material very carefully before he reaches any final conclusion on Senate bill 133.

When I first talked to Mr. Boris Stern in regard to industry-wide collective-bargaining problems, I discovered that he was at work on a pamphlet which he hoped to have ready for release within a very few weeks. Just last Friday, March 7, this bulletin came off the press. Its title is "Collective Bargaining With Associations and Groups of Employers, Bulletin No. 897." I shall not take the time to read it to the Senate this afternoon, Mr. President, but I ask that pages 1 to 14 of the bulletin be printed in the RECORD at this point as a part of my remarks as exhibit 2.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From Bulletin No. 897 of the U. S. Bureau of Labor Statistics]

COLLECTIVE BARGAINING WITH ASSOCIATIONS AND GROUPS OF EMPLOYERS [1]

Most of the examples of industry-wide bargaining in the United States are the product of generations of experience, and as a rule the employer-union relations in these industries have been remarkably stable and peaceful. In the pressed or blown glassware industry, one of the branches of glass and glassware having national bargaining, no major strike throughout the industry has occurred since collective bargaining began with an employers' association in 1888. Similar conditions have prevailed in the pottery industry since 1922. The 1946 contract between the National Automatic Sprinkler and Fire Control Associations and the United Association of Journeymen Plumbers and Steamfitters (AFL) is a revision of the original agreement of 1915; and the 1946 agreement between the Anthracite Coal Operators and the United Mine Workers of America (AFL) is a compilation of resolutions, revisions, rulings, and decisions dating back to 1903. Bargaining on an industry basis exists in the elevator installation and repair, installation of automatic sprinklers, pottery and related products, stove making, and wallpaper industries, and in coal mining.

Agreements covering all the employers in an industry within a geographic region are somewhat more numerous than those having application throughout an entire industry. Even more numerous are the instances in which associations or groups of employers are dealt with on a city-wide or metropolitan area basis. In this study, the existing extent and the areas of bargaining with associations and groups of employers are described. The most significant extension of this form of bargaining in recent years occurred during World War II in the shipbuilding industry. The metal trades department of the American Federation of Labor negotiated a master agreement during 1941 with Pacific Coast shipyards organized by unions affiliated with the AFL. Prior to this time, joint agreements had been signed by these unions on the West Coast with employers in a single city. In other industries, since 1939, the practice only widened in those that had used this method of dealing for many years. The number of workers covered by these agreements increased somewhat as more of the Nation's industry became organized and was brought under agreement. However, the relative proportion covered in most industries did not change greatly.

Few of the examples of collective bargaining on an industry, geographic, or city basis occurred in the mass-production industries, although a single agreement in the automobile industry, for instance, may cover many more employees than an association agreement covering every employer in an industry or trade within the same city. In mass-production industries, trends are developing toward standardized conditions in large segments of industries through corporation-wide collective bargaining. The efforts of unions are directed first toward bringing all the plants of a given large corporation, regardless of geographic location, within the scope of a single agreement. An example is the corporation-wide bargaining between the Ford Motor Co. and the United Automobile, Aircraft and Agricultural Implement Workers of America (CIO). Notwithstanding the great number of workers affected, corporation-wide bargaining differs widely from multi-employer collective bargaining which is the subject of the present study.

Early in 1947, more than 4,000,000 workers were covered by agreements negotiated between trade-unions and associations and groups of employers. These are about equally divided between manufacturing and nonmanufacturing industries. Approximately a fourth of all workers covered by union agreements in manufacturing and a third of such workers in nonmanufacturing are working under agreements negotiated with groups or associations of employers. The agreements were negotiated by one or more unions (1) with a formal or informal association of employers or (2) with informal multi-employer groups. In presenting the information on agreements, no attempt was made to distinguish between agreements with associations and with other multi-employer groups. Identical agreements signed by separate employers with the same union were included, if there appeared to have been negotiations with a group or committee of employers.

WORKER COVERAGE OF GROUP BARGAINING

In table 1, the extent of association and employer-group bargaining is shown, based upon the percent of total workers under agreement in the respective industries.

APPROACH TO STANDARDIZATION OF WORKING CONDITIONS

One of the major efforts of labor unions in this country has been directed toward the standardization of working conditions throughout an industry or area, in order to lift substantial wages and to eliminate or reduce the factors of wages and hours in competitive costs. One of the ways the labor movement has sought to attain this objective has been by pressing for Federal or State legislation for the protection of certain groups of workers or to establish minimum standards applicable to all workers. Legislation has been sought especially for women and minors on the ground that the interests of society as a whole require that the health and welfare of these groups of workers be protected, and also because they often are in a weak bargaining position and might be used to lower the standards of all workers. Certain minimum standards of health, safety, and sanitation were established by legislation when large sections of the population felt a need for such, and the labor movement from time to time has favored legislative action as the most effective remedy for problems of health and safety. Under the Fair Labor Standards Act, minimum wage and hour standards have been established in much of American industry, thus raising the area of collective bargaining on these issues to higher levels.

Prior to World War II the approach to standardization of wages and working conditions throughout governmental action was secondary as far as American trade-unions are concerned. Organized labor in this country has directed its chief efforts toward standardization by means of collective bargaining. For this reason the labor movement generally has encouraged parallel organizations of employers for collective-bargaining purposes, in order to obtain extended coverage under one agreement. In some industries the employers also have favored the extension of uniform wages and working conditions by making the terms of a collective-bargaining agreement applicable to a large segment of an industry. When collective bargaining with groups or associations of employers has proved impracticable or impossible, some unions have utilized the technique of presenting identical agreements to the employers within an industry or competitive area. This latter method usually is practicable only in instances where there are a large number of small employers, particularly within a metropolitan area.

Although industry-wide trade associations have come to be a common characteristic of American business, the scope of employer groups or associations engaged in collective bargaining is generally much more limited. Within an industry, employers may be organized for purposes of collective bargaining on a city, regional, or in a few instances, Nation-wide basis, or two or more such employer organizations may exist in the same area. As a rule, the unions work toward the extension of the collective-bargaining agreement to as wide a section of the industry as possible. In a number of cases the unions and employer organizations together have directed their efforts toward bringing unorganized sections of the industry within the scope of collective-bargaining agreements. A necessary corollary of dealing through employers' associations is a high degree of unionization among the employees.

During World War II, industry-wide production drives, settling of labor disputes by the National War Labor Board on the basis of industry or area practice, and the Government's wage stabilization policies all contributed to standardization of wages and working conditions throughout the industries or areas. Directives of the National War Labor Board were influenced by precedent and prevailing practices in the industry or area and many agreements in the same industry came to have similar provisions on certain subjects. Frequently an order of the Board would affect several employers and the substance of the order would be incorporated into union agreements the employers might have negotiated, without regard to the existence of an employers' association. In the shipbuilding industry, in which a stabilization commission was established, tripartite zone standard agreements were negotiated, covering a limited number of subjects. The parties to the agreements were the Government itself and most of the employers and unions in the industry. The shipbuilding industry in the United States was divided into four zones, in each of which the zone standards determined practices with regard to those subjects covered by the agreements.

The attention directed to a few national associations with long records of collective bargaining should not be permitted to obscure thousands of employer organizations which have negotiated agreements on a regional or metropolitan basis and which affect hundreds of thousands of workers. These employer groups vary widely as to type, structure, procedure, and scope of activity. Some are temporary and highly informal, with no tangible evidences of permanent organization. Others have complex structures with elaborate constitutions and a staff of full-time employees. Between these extremes there are wide variations in organization, procedures, and functions.

NATION-WIDE COLLECTIVE BARGAINING IN THE COAL INDUSTRY

In anthracite mining a single agreement is signed to cover the entire industry. In bituminous-coal mining, the union negotiated agreements with the operators in the central competitive field (Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, and West Virginia) from 1898 until 1927. The agreement for this area set the pattern for negotiations in other areas between districts of the union and local associations of coalmine operators. The interstate bargaining relationship in the central competitive field collapsed in 1927 and was not reestablished until after the passage of the National Industrial Recovery Act. In 1934 an agreement was signed with the operators in the Appalachian area which served, as the previous interstate agreement had, as a pattern which the remainder of the industry generally followed. Districts of the United Mine Workers of America negotiate agreements with parallel associations of employers, which follow the terms of the Appalachian agreement. In 1941 the northern and southern groups of operators in the Appalachian area signed separate agreements with the union, and unified negotiations were not reestablished until 1945. In that year, the first industry-wide agreement in bituminous-coal mining was negotiated.

Following the break-down of negotiations between the union and the operators in the spring of 1946, which led to a Nation-wide soft-coal strike, and the rejection by both the union and the operators of President Truman's May 16 arbitration proposal, the President on May 21 authorized and directed the Secretary of the Interior to take over the mines. On May 29 an agreement was signed by John L. Lewis, president of the union, and J. A. Krug, Coal Mines Administrator and Secretary of the Interior. The agreement covered all the mines which were seized.

NATIONAL BARGAINING ON THE RAILROADS

The traditional bargaining unit in railroad transportation is the individual railroad system. The workers are organized on the basis of craft, and agreements with the various systems are negotiated by each craft union or by "system federations" of shop craft unions. Although the regular working agreements continue to be signed by systems, on occasion certain specific questions of major importance, as wages, have been settled on a Nation-wide basis. Negotiations are generally conducted by the nonoperating unions (clerical, maintenance, and shop crafts) and by the operating unions (train and engine service) separately with representatives of the railroads selected on a regional basis.

OTHER INDUSTRY OR TRADE-WIDE BARGAINING

The American examples of trade-wide bargaining of longest status occur in the pottery and glassware industries. Since the early years of this century, an annual meeting has been held between the representatives of the United States Potters' Association and the National Brotherhood of Operative Potters. The current agreement between these parties, for example, continues a provision for joint discharge committees first set up in 1913. Since 1888 the National Association of Manufacturers of Pressed and Blown Glassware, or its predecessor, has been meeting with the American Flint Glass Workers Union. The "Star Island Agreement" of 1903 established a grievance procedure which still is utilized in this industry. The Glass Bottle Blowers' Association of the United States and Canada signed its first national agreement in 1890 and currently has an agreement with the Glass Container Manufacturers' Institute which affects several thousand employees in the industry.

[a] There also is some bargaining on a city, county, and/or metropolitan area basis.

In each of these cases the bargaining agreements are confined chiefly to detailed piecerate schedules, although a considerable body of "unwritten law" has developed to supplement the national agreement in governing employer-employee relations within a plant. Originally, the trade-wide bargaining was established to regulate the working conditions of highly skilled craftsmen within these industries. With the development of technological changes, one skilled occupation after another has been eliminated. As a result, the unions have extended their jurisdiction to include a major part of the workers in and around the plants and these skilled and semiskilled employees are now covered in the national agreements to the degree that they are unionized. In the glassware industry, however, there are some companies which have negotiated separate agreements. In the pottery industry virtually all of the vitreous and semivitreous branches of the industry are covered by the association agreement.

A different kind of bargaining relationship has been built up in the manufacture of flat glass. By far the major part of the production in this industry is centralized in two large producing companies. These companies, the Pittsburgh Plate Glass Co. and the Libby-Owens-Ford Glass Co., negotiate their agreements jointly, both with the Window Glass Cutters League (AFL) and the Federation of Glass, Ceramic, and Silica Sand Workers (CIO), but each company signs separate, identical agreements. The two companies also collaborate in the administration of the agreement to insure uniform patterns of interpretation. Most of the other manufacturers are organized into the Fourcault Manufacturers' Association, which negotiates the agreement with the unions.

There are a few other instances of industry-wide dealing, each of them originating from the efforts of a highly skilled craft to protect its conditions of employment. Among these are the Wallpaper Institute and the United Wallpaper Craftsmen and Workers of North America, covering wallpaper printing; the National Automatic Sprinkler Association and the United Association of Journeymen Plumbers and Steamfitters of the United States and Canada, covering sprinkler fitting; and the Manufacturers Protective and Development Association and the International Molders and Foundry Workers Union of North America, covering stove-molding and hot-water castings.

Employers engaged in the manufacture of paper-mill wire cloth sign similar agreements with the American Wire Weavers' Protective Association. Another instance of trade-wide bargaining occurs in the installation, repair, and maintenance of elevators. Although wage rates are negotiated locally, other working conditions are regulated by conferences between the National Elevator Manufacturing Industry, Inc., and the International Union of Elevator Constructors. A standard agreement is used in all localities, with the locally negotiated rates inserted as agreed upon.

The manufacture of wooden kegs and barrels should also be mentioned as an instance of national conferences between the employers and the union. The conferences, however, have resulted in no agreement on an industry scale, and discussion of working conditions has been of far less importance than mutual discussion of trade-promotion plans.

INDUSTRY-WIDE BARGAINING IN MASS-PRODUCTION INDUSTRIES

In the more recently organized, mass-production industries there are at present no examples of industry-wide collective bargaining resulting in a single union agreement covering the full range of employer-union relations. In a few such industries, however, certain bargaining relationships have come into existence which produce considerable uniformity in the agreements throughout an industry. In the rubber industry, for example, a wage-increase agreement was signed on March 2, 1946, by the four largest manufacturers, which affected a large proportion of the workers in the industry. This so-called Big Four agreement is limited in scope to a few subjects; it differs from the usual union agreement also in that it does not have the customary provisions relating to termination and renewal. The agreement provides: "This agreement shall finally dispose of all issues covered in these negotiations including all of the union's seven-point program for a period of 1 year except that during this 1-year period the general wage scale shall be subject to negotiation of conditions economically and in the industry warrant, but only on a four-company (Big Four) basis." If this joint relationship of the four corporations with the United Rubber, Cork, Linoleum, & Plastic Workers of America is continued in the future, it may be possible to describe the collective bargaining in this industry as approaching industry-wide negotiations.

A degree of standardization has been achieved in the meat-packing industry through the medium of uniform expiration dates of the agreements with the principal packers. Certain agreements affecting a large number of workers negotiated by the United Packing House Workers of America (CIO) and by the Amalgamated Meat Cutters & Butcher Workmen of North America (AFL), covering various plants of the four largest corporations in the industry, have expired on the same day each year for several years.

NEGOTIATION OF SIMILAR AGREEMENTS IN THE STEEL INDUSTRY

In the basic steel industry in the United States there is no employers' association which engages in collective bargaining, yet a great deal of standardization in industrial relations has occurred in recent years. The industry is composed of two dominant groups of employers, one known as Big Steel and the other as Little Steel. The first includes the United States Steel Corp. and its subsidiaries, and the second is made up of a number of independent companies. The Steel Workers Organizing Committee, now the United Steelworkers of America, first signed written agreements with the United States Steel Corp. in 1937 and since then, with a few exceptions, practically all of the basic steel industry has been brought under agreement. Even though there is no bargaining by employers' associations, the major provisions of agreements throughout the basic steel industry are similar. This degree of uniformity is occasioned by a number of factors, first among them probably being the predominant position of the United States Steel Corp. Agreements with this corporation tend to set the pattern for the rest of the industry. Also, by long-established practice the same wage adjustments generally are made throughout the industry at the same time. During World War II directives of the National War Labor Board, which generally were applicable to large sections of the industry, further encouraged the growth of uniform collective-bargaining practices. The United Steelworkers of America, the most important union in the industry, also tended to bring a degree of uniformity into the bargaining relationships and practices. Agreements with most of the employers in the basic steel industry will expire in February 1947, and negotiations are in process for new agreements. (Since this was written the parties have agreed to extend the agreements until April 30, 1947.)

COLLECTIVE BARGAINING BY GEOGRAPHIC AREAS

In the hosiery industry a bargaining relationship has existed between the Full-Fashioned Hosiery Manufacturers of America, Inc., and the American Federation of Hosiery Workers since 1927. The employers' association, originally covering only Philadelphia mills, now covers a major part of the northern section of the full-fashioned hosiery industry. Conferences occur annually, with occasional additional meetings on specific subjects. Under the agreement the joint relations are administered by a permanent impartial chairman.

In the textile industry there are association agreements between the Textile Workers' Union of America and associations of silk and rayon mills in a number of States. A joint arrangement of longer standing exists in the dyeing and finishing of textiles in nonintegrated mills. In cotton textiles in Massachusetts and in knit goods in Philadelphia and New York many of the employers are members of associations which negotiate union agreements.

Maritime workers usually deal with employer organizations which represent the shipping operators on a given coast. Practically all the union agreements in the maritime industry are negotiated with associations or informal committees representing the employers. On the Pacific coast the companies are organized into the Pacific American Shipowners' Association. On the Atlantic and Gulf coasts the most recent agreements were negotiated and signed by a committee for companies and agents, Atlantic and Gulf coasts, most of the members of which are also members of the American Merchant Marine Institute.

The Waterfront Employers of the Pacific Coast embraces employers of longshoremen along the entire west coast; much of the work of the association, however, is carried on through affiliated local waterfront employers' associations in Seattle, Portland, San Francisco, and San Pedro (Los Angeles). The International Longshoremen's and Warehousemen's Union (CIO) negotiates a general cargo agreement with the coast-wide association, which signs "on behalf of" the four local organizations. Separate agreements covering dock workers and ship clerks are negotiated with each of the port associations. On the Atlantic coast the International Longshoremen's Association (AFL), as a rule, negotiates separate agreements with employer associations in each port.[2]

In the Pacific Northwest the pulp and paper industry, although dealing elsewhere on the basis of individual companies, is combined into the Pacific Coast Association of Pulp and Paper Manufacturers which deals with the two national unions in the field.

[2] For some time there has been no formal federated organization of the unions in the maritime industry. For a few months during 1946, however, the CIO unions and an independent formed the committee for maritime unity for the purpose of joint negotiations with all employers simultaneously. The American Federation of Labor, also in 1946, established a maritime trades department, composed of AFL unions in the industry. Most of the unlicensed personnel on the Atlantic coast are represented by the National Maritime Union (CIO). On the west coast these workers are represented principally by three unions, the Sailors' Union of the Pacific (AFL), the Pacific Coast Marine Firemen, Oilers, Watertenders, and Wipers' Association (independent), and the National Union of Marine Cooks and Stewards (CIO).

The unions, representing different occupations in the industry, are the International Brotherhood of Papermakers and the International Brotherhood of Pulp, Sulphite, and Paper Mill Workers. The employers' organization is described in the agreement as follows: "This Pacific Coast Association of Pulp and Paper Manufacturers * * * of which the signatory company is a member, is an employer association of a majority of the pulp and paper manufacturing companies in the Pacific coast area, comprising the States of Washington, Oregon, and California, and as bargaining agent with authority to bind its members by a majority vote of such mills, has met with a bargaining committee from the signatory union for a period of years, beginning in 1934 * * *." Notwithstanding this provision, each company signs a separate document with the local unions which represent its employees.

The lumber industry is one which is not yet well organized throughout the country but in which the dominant method of present dealing is through associations within the producing area. The Columbia Basin Loggers' Association and the Timber Producers' Association in Minnesota are examples of associations dealing with the union in this industry.

The fishing industry, particularly on the Pacific coast where it is well organized, is an example of collective bargaining almost exclusively on an association basis. The employers, however, are organized into a number of separate associations, such as the Alaska Packers' Association and the Central Pacific Wholesale Fish Dealers' Association.

In retail trade the National Association of Retail Meat Dealers, composed of affiliated State and local associations throughout the United States, negotiates with the Amalgamated Meat Cutters and Butcher Workmen of America. The national agreement between these parties, first negotiated in 1937, is confined to a statement of principles and policies of mutual interest to both parties, who agree to "give their aid and good offices to the execution of fair and reasonable contracts between local unions and affiliated associations in the various localities where the said unions and affiliated associations exist." The agreement further states that it is recognized "that local conditions require local treatment and that it is not practical or feasible to include in this agreement the matters of wages, hours, and conditions of employment." In the Midwest the Central States Drivers' Council, an organ of the International Brotherhood of Teamsters, Chauffeurs, Warehousemen and Helpers of America (AFL) negotiates agreements with the Central States Area Employers Association Negotiating Committee. Collective bargaining in canning and preserving foods on the west coast is largely on an association basis.

Most of the shipbuilding and boatbuilding industry on the west coast is covered by a master agreement negotiated by the metal trades department of the American Federation of Labor. During the war, as previously noted, bargaining on major issues in this industry was on a tripartite basis, and wages and certain other questions were determined by the zone standards. Issues not covered by the zone standards were settled in the ordinary processes of collective bargaining. At the present time the zone standards are still in effect.

BARGAINING IN THE NEEDLE TRADES WITHIN METROPOLITAN AREAS

Outstanding examples of stable bargaining relationships over a long period of time between employers' associations and unions are found in the needle trades. In the men's and women's clothing, men's hats and millinery, and fur industries the earliest efforts of unions to organize were accompanied by efforts to combine into associations the employers within the producing area. Bargaining has become established in these industries, with highly developed industrial relations machinery within each of the metropolitan areas which are important as producing centers. These unions and employers' associations customarily make use of a permanent impartial chairman to administer the agreement and there are numerous examples of joint trade boards, stabilization commissions, and other similar bodies which deal on a day-to-day basis with the problems of the industry.

These industries all have the problem of "run away" shops, which leave the unionized areas and, with the small capital investment required, are able to establish themselves in low-wage, semirural sections. This has been a major reason for the unions' insistence upon dealing on an association basis, for it is through the combined pressure of both the union and the employer association that these "run away" shops can be brought under control. Another problem within these industries is the regulation of the jobber-contractor relationship. Jobbers have taken advantage of both the extreme seasonal fluctuations and the small investment required in setting up a shop to encourage an oversupply of contractors. Cutthroat competition among the contractors has been furthered by the frequent practice of establishing fly-by-night shops for the duration of a contract secured by underbidding regularly operating shops. Both the owners of shops operating under union conditions and their workers have thus faced a constant threat to industrial stability. Through collective bargaining, the oversupply of contractors has been dealt with and the jobber's responsibility for maintaining union conditions in his contract shops has been established. A large portion of the employer-union negotiations in the needle trades deal with these three-way problems, in addition to the usual wages, hours, and working conditions.

The employers within a given city are usually organized into more than one association within each of the needle trades. The basis of distinction is both the type of product and the classification of employers (i. e., jobbers, contractors, or inside manufacturers). The unions have frequently expressed a desire for more uniformity among the employers' organizations throughout the industry. Although a major part of the production in the country is covered by the New York City agreements alone, the unions have made repeated efforts over several decades to secure industry-wide dealing in the interests of national standardization. Thus far, however, only in men's clothing has there been a successful approach to industry-wide bargaining. For a number of years the Amalgamated Clothing Workers of America has negotiated major wage questions with the Clothing Manufacturers' Association of the United States and with the shirt industry.

OTHER CITY-WIDE BARGAINING

In many industries and trades characterized by numerous small establishments within a city, collective bargaining has been conducted with associations of employers within the city. In many cases the associations are formal organizations in which the association officers have the power to bind all members to the agreed terms of employment. In other cases the employers may unite informally and perhaps only for the duration of the bargaining conferences. In many instances the lack of a continuing employers' association makes no difference in the actual negotiation of the agreement, but complicates considerably the enforcement of the agreement.

In cases of city-wide bargaining the extent of coverage of the employers' association generally depends upon the strength of the union. It is common to find within a city an organized group of employers dealing with the union, while other employers within the same industry are organized into a separate association or have no organization. In some cases the union employers form an organized group within a trade association which also includes nonunion employers in the city.

There are probably 5,000 local or city employer associations throughout the country which deal with various unions. More of these are found in building construction than in any other single industry. Other examples, in which the predominant method of dealing is with city-wide associations, are brewing, retail trade, baking, printing and publishing, restaurants, trucking, and barber shops. An important development is found in the electrical machinery industry, where the United Electrical, Radio and Machine Workers of America (CIO) recently negotiated an agreement with the Electronics Manufacturers' Association, representing 20 employers in the New York City area. This association was formed at the insistence of the employers, who are relatively small and who previously had signed separate agreements. The employers desire, through negotiating a single blanket agreement, to achieve a degree of uniformity in wage and working conditions in order to reduce these as competitive factors in costs.

ASSOCIATIONS OF EMPLOYERS ACROSS INDUSTRY LINES

Employer-group federations embracing all types of business within a city are largely a development of the last 10 years and are concentrated in the far Western States. Leader in this field is the San Francisco Employers Council, formed in 1939, and which in April 1945 had 1,995 members, 919 of whom were affiliated through their various industry groups. The other members were individuals or independent companies. The objectives of the council, as stated in its articles of incorporation, are (1) to encourage the organization of autonomous employer groups and cooperation among these groups in matters relating to labor relations; (2) "to promote the recognition and exercise of the right of employers to bargain collectively"; and (3) upon request, "to assist its members and others in matters relating to the negotiation, execution, and performance of fair labor contracts." The council negotiates or participates in negotiations of agreements between its members and the unions in the city, and performs various other services.

Of a similar character is the Industrial Conference Board of Tacoma, Wash.—an over-all agency for a number of independent companies and 15 or 20 employers' associations each of which has one or more union agreements. Both the Reno Employers Council of Reno, Nev., and the Silver Bow Employers Association of Butte, Mont., participate in the negotiation of labor contracts for their various employer groups. In Sacramento, Calif., the Sacramento Valley Associated Industries is the unifying agency for a dozen or more associations covering such varied fields as bowling alleys, beverages, furniture warehouses, taxicabs, machine shops, liquor and tobacco dealers, retail foods, wholesale bakeries, draymen, druggists, tire dealers, and building owners. Each association has a union contract signed in its behalf by an individual, who serves both as executive secretary to the associations and as general manager of the Associated Industries.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, as the debate on Senate bill 133 progresses I think that later in this session we shall want to refer repeatedly to the information contained in this excellent bulletin on Collective Bargaining With Associations and Groups of Employers, because I think it is clear from the data presented in the bulletin that passage of Senate bill 133 would be disruptive of the labor relations in a large number of industries, involving a great many thousands of employees.

The testimony that was presented to us by some employer representatives at our committee hearings, Mr. President, shows that there are many employers who are completely sold on the desirability of group-employer collective bargaining with labor insofar as the particular problems of their industry are concerned. Take, for example, the maritime industry, with which I have had some years of experience as the Pacific-coast arbitrator. I am satisfied that the formation of the West Coast Ship Owners Association for collective-bargaining problems brought remarkable labor-relations stability to the industry during the years when I was arbitrator. I do not mean we did not have a great deal of trouble, for we did; but I do mean that the united actions of the shipowners in the great cases that we tried were a great boon to them. Prior to the formation of their employers' association the union strategy—and it is not a bad one as far as effectiveness is concerned—was to pick off shipowners one at a time, starting with the ones the union felt were in the weakest bargaining position. However, after the association was formed the officers of that association, principally through Mr. Frank Foisie, the president, and Mr. Gregory Harrison, its general counsel, were in a position to represent and speak for all the shipowners on the west coast.

I saw with my own eyes how the procedures which were developed under that type of industry-wide bargaining developed responsibility and stability within the industry. Hence, I was not at all surprised to hear Mr. Almon E. Roth, president of National Federation of American Shipping, testify in effect that the passage of Senate bill 133 would be ruinous to the maritime industry in this country insofar as stable labor relations are concerned. When Senators get the printed proceedings of the hearings I recommend that they turn to Mr. Roth's testimony, because I think he presented a very clear picture of the undesirable effect that Senate bill 133 would have upon the maritime industry. Other witnesses expressed similar views in regard to the undesirable effect of Senate bill 133 upon their industry.

Now for a few minutes let us take a look at the nature of this type of collective bargaining called industry-wide bargaining.

Industry-wide bargaining presupposes authorized representatives of employers and workers, sitting across the table from each other, negotiating a labor contract that will cover all the terms of employment for an entire industry during the life of the agreement.

In this theoretical and comprehensive sense industry-wide bargaining does not exist in any industry, with the possible exception of the coal industry, and some new, narrowly defined or locally concentrated industries. In the major industries and their chief divisions, there are many unions and many employers. Some unions within the same industry may bargain on an industry-wide scale, while others bargain locally. Some employers within the same industry may form associations to bargain on a broad regional or national scale, but the resulting contracts may still be short of industry-wide bargaining.

In an over-all sense, labor agreements are a combination of master contracts, supplemental agreements, interpretations, rulings, and understandings worked out between the parties at different levels of a structure, which, on the union side, rises from the union locals to the headquarters of the international union, and which, on the employers' side, rises from the individual plant to the national office of the company or the national headquarters of the employers' association.

Where the master contract is negotiated locally, supplemental agreements on matters of regional or industry-wide concern may be negotiated at higher levels. Conversely, master contracts negotiated at the higher levels usually require supplemental agreements to permit local diversities on matters of local concern. Even a single company contract, national in its geographic coverage, may be supplemented by local agreements negotiated at the company's local plants.

GENERAL EXAMPLES

Full-fashioned hosiery industry: The 35 member companies of the Full-Fashioned Hosiery Manufacturers of America are scattered from Massachusetts to California and the 1946–47 contract with the American Federation of Hosiery Workers states that it "shall apply uniformly to all full-fashioned factories in the United States who are members of the association." But this master agreement covers only about 35 percent of the industry. It is not a product of industry-wide bargaining.

Meat-packing industry: The Nation-wide contracts of the Big Four meat packers with headquarters in Chicago cover plants from coast to coast, but each packing company negotiates its own contracts with one or more of the three unions in the field. Such contracts are not a product of industry-wide bargaining.

Maritime industry: The Pacific American Shipowners Association and the Committee for Companies and Agents, Atlantic and Gulf Coasts each have a number of coastwide contracts with various maritime unions. Although these agreements cover extensive areas, they are not industry-wide, nor are other coastwise contracts between employers and workers in longshore operations—such, for example, as the master agreement of the Galveston Maritime Association, the Houston Maritime Association, and the Master Stevedores Association of Texas with 21 locals of the International Longshoremen's Association, A. F. of L.

Narrowly defined industries: If the transportation of automobiles or the construction of elevators or the manufacture of automatic sprinkler and fire-control equipment can be considered separate industries, then the contracts of the National Automobile Transporters with the International Brotherhood of Teamsters; of the National Elevator Manufacturing Industry, Inc., with the International Union of Elevator Constructors; and of the National Automatic Sprinkler and Fire Control Association with the United Association of Journeymen and Apprentices of the Plumbing and Pipe Fitting Industry, approximate industry-wide bargaining, although none of these agreements pretends to cover all the contractual relationships between the parties on the terms of employment.

Stove manufacturing industry: The Manufacturers Protective and Development Association is a national employers' association in the stove manufacturing industry which has bargained with the International Molders and Foundry Workers Union since 1891. Its 30 or more members, though scattered throughout many States, represent less than 25 percent of the industry. The master agreements it negotiates usually do not set the pattern for other labor contracts in the industry.

Rubber industry: Basic agreements are negotiated between each of the big four rubber companies and the United Rubber Workers, CIO. In the spring of 1946 these four companies—Firestone, Goodrich, Goodyear, and United States Rubber—combined to negotiate wage increases with the United Rubber Workers on an industry-wide basis. This supplemental contract is now being renegotiated. The master agreements negotiated between each company and the union may themselves be a product of Nation-wide or local bargaining. In January 1947 the United States Rubber Co. negotiated with the United Rubber Workers its first country-wide basic contract. But this master agreement will not become effective until supplemental contracts are negotiated between the union locals and each of the 30 plants scattered from Rhode Island to California.

Railroad industry: Agreements covering the general terms of employment are negotiated between each individual railroad system and one or more of the operating or nonoperating unions. Supplemental agreements relating to vacations, general wage increases, and certain other items have, from time to time, been negotiated on an industry-wide basis through three regional carriers' conference committees sitting in joint session with representatives of the various unions.

Shipbuilding industry: At the top of the hierarchy of the collective-bargaining structure in the industry is the National Shipbuilding Conference—such as that of February 1946—at which industry-wide amendments to the four zone standard agreements are negotiated. The zone standard agreements—one for each of the Atlantic, Gulf, Great Lakes, and Pacific coast zones—the Government was a third party to them—are, in turn, superimposed on regional or local agreements. The most important of these is the Pacific coast shipbuilders' agreement of 1941, to which 56 shipbuilding companies and 13 different international unions were parties. Still further decentralization of bargaining within the framework of the Pacific coast shipbuilders' master agreement occurs when supplemental agreements are negotiated for each craft union and local regulations are negotiated between each company and the union.

DOES INDUSTRY-WIDE BARGAINING RESULT IN UNIFORM STANDARDS OF EMPLOYMENT?

Industry-wide bargaining does not necessarily lead to industry-wide uniformity in the terms of the labor contract, whether the subject be wages or otherwise; nor will a prohibition on industry-wide bargaining necessarily prevent a development of uniform labor standards throughout an industry.

Industry-wide negotiating conferences may accept the principle of wage differentials and create variables in the wage scale for different localities or plants, or the general industry conference may leave wage negotiations for supplemental bargaining between union and employer at the local level. As a third possibility, the general conference may prescribe minimum-wage standards above which each employer and the union local may be free to negotiate on wages. This principle also applies to vacations, seniority, hours of work, holidays, union seniority, and other clauses of the master contract. No master agreement of wide area coverage puts all the terms of employment into a strait-jacket of uniformity.

There are several ways in which the terms of labor contracts might become standardized throughout an industry without industry-wide bargaining: First, employers and employees in preconference discussions among themselves may adopt common policies toward proposed contract terms and then attempt to maintain them through contact with their local representatives at the conference tables; second, employers and unions may follow the lead of a key company or association by accepting the same terms which it has negotiated with the union; third, through independent or cooperative research in the administration of existing contracts employers and employees may arrive at an understanding as to what terms subsequent contracts in the industry should contain. The maintenance of industry-wide research agencies by employers' associations and international unions whose findings may lead to mutual understandings between the employers and organized workers in an industry does not constitute industry-wide bargaining.

GENERAL EXAMPLES

Flour, feed, and cereal industry: A regional agreement in the Pacific Northwest between the Flour, Feed, and Cereal Employers' Association of Washington and Oregon and the Northwest Council of Grain Processors applies the generally accepted principles of legislative federalism in the following language:

> While this agreement generally covers working conditions in the plants of all employers, it is recognized that there may be local conditions at individual plants which cannot be negotiated on an area-wide basis. Accordingly a supplemental agreement for each plant shall be executed between the employer and the local union which shall set forth classifications of employment, rates of pay, seniority rules, and other stipulations, but not in substantial contradiction herewith, covering such local conditions. Such supplemental agreements, including any amendments thereto or modifications thereof, shall not be effective until approved by both the council and the association.
> General wage rates for employees covered by this agreement shall be negotiated on an area-wide basis between the association and the council. The specific rates for classifications established for each plant shall be set forth in supplemental agreements, but such rates shall be in accordance with those negotiated between the association and the council. However, where, due to the operations of an individual plant, the general prevailing rate for any particular classification is inequitable either to an employee or group of employees or to an employer, the rate for such classification may be negotiated between the local union and the employer, but, before becoming effective, any rate so negotiated must be approved by both the association and the council.
>
> The parties hereto recognize the principle of seniority, which shall be construed to be plant seniority unless otherwise provided in supplemental agreements entered into for each plant.
> During the calendar year of 1946 vacations will be granted in accordance with current practice in each plant. After the execution of this agreement the association and the council will negotiate uniform provisions regarding vacations for each plant to be effective for the calendar year of 1947 and subsequent years.

The retail meat industry: The National Association of Retail Meat Dealers with headquarters in Chicago has a national agreement with the Amalgamated Meat Cutters and Butcher Workmen of America which is confined to a statement of principles and policies of mutual interest to both parties, who agree to give their aid and good offices to the execution of fair and reasonable contracts between local unions and affiliated associations in the various localities where the said unions and affiliated associations exist.

Electrical manufacturing industry: In January 1947 officials of the United Electrical, Radio, and Machine Workers, CIO, on behalf of 225,000 members in the four largest manufacturing companies, drew up contract proposals which would be presented to each of these companies—General Electric, Westinghouse, Sylvania Electric, and the electrical division of General Motors—in separate contract negotiations. Such contract planning is in advance of actual collective bargaining on an employer or multiemployer basis.

Woolen manufacturing industry: Although representatives of some 170 woolen companies meet in conference with representatives of the Textile Workers Union, CIO, to exchange proposals and submit views, agreement is seldom reached. After the conference is concluded, the union and the American Woolen Co. negotiate a contract which often becomes the pattern for the industry. The terms of this contract are generally adopted by other companies and their union locals.

Men's clothing industry: Although the United States Clothing Manufacturers Association may negotiate no industry-wide agreements with the Amalgamated Clothing Workers, CIO, the national bargaining committee of the association and officials of the union may informally agree upon wage standards and submit their findings to the parties negotiating contracts in the various cities or market areas.

WHAT PART, IF ANY, DOES AREA-WIDE OR INDUSTRY-WIDE BARGAINING PLAY IN THE ADMINISTRATION AND ENFORCEMENT OF COLLECTIVE BARGAINING CONTRACTS?

Area-wide or industry-wide bargaining as now practiced provides a means for establishing a structure of joint agencies to administer and enforce labor contracts.

In a few instances regional or industry-wide bargaining is directed exclusively to establishing over-all administrative agencies which may act as a tribunal of last resort in settling disputes arising from the application of local contracts. In most cases of area-wide bargaining for a master contract a structure of executive agencies is provided to carry out the terms of the agreement.

GENERAL EXAMPLES

Newspaper publishing industry: The American Newspaper Publishers Association and the International Typographical Union have an international arbitration agreement, whose code of procedure is used by the Washington, D. C., Newspaper Publishers Association and local 101 of the Typographical Union in arbitrating disputes on proposed amendments to their contracts.

Retail meat industry: The National Association of Retail Meat Dealers and the Amalgamated Meat Cutters and Butcher Workmen of North America, AFL, have an industry-wide agreement creating a seven-member national labor relations board for the retail meat trade. Each party contributes 3 members, who, together with the neutral chairman, have appellate jurisdiction over labor disputes arising out of contracts negotiated between local associations and union locals throughout the United States.

Construction industry: The National Electrical Contractors Association and the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, AFL, have sponsored a council on industrial relations of the electrical construction industry of the United States and Canada, which has been accepted by local chapters of the association and local lodges of the union as a tribunal of last resort in resolving their differences arising from the administration of their local or regional contracts.

In January 1947 the Associated General Contractors of America and the building and construction trades department of the American Federation of Labor negotiated an industry-wide agreement creating a national joint conference committee to assist in settling disputes in the construction trades not otherwise resolved. The association and the union each select a member to represent the heavy-construction industry, another to represent the highway- and road-construction industry, a third for the building trades, and a fourth to represent specialized and subcontracting employers and their workers. These eight members of the national joint conference committee will set up separate committees for each of the three major branches of the construction industry, and in addition will appoint a suitable committee for disputes that appear to cut across two or more branches. Jurisdiction will be accepted only after all other means provided in local contracts for settlement have failed. Jurisdiction is voluntary with the parties, but once it is accepted, decisions will be binding.

Maritime industry: The Waterfront Employers Association of the Pacific Coast has a coastwise agreement with the International Longshoremen's and Warehousemen's Union, CIO, which permits appeals from local joint port labor relations committees in Seattle, Portland, San Francisco, and San Pedro to a joint coast labor relations committee with headquarters in San Francisco.

Another coastwise agreement between steamship companies in the intercoastal and offshore trade of the Pacific coast and the Sailors' Union of the Pacific provides that the employers and the union shall appoint representatives in Seattle, Portland, and San Pedro to hear and adjudicate disputes arising at these ports. Appeals in case of disagreement are taken to the port committee at San Francisco from whom a final appeal, in case of a deadlock, may be taken to a referee whose decision is binding.

The Pacific American Shipowners Association, representing 34 shipping companies, has a contract with the National Union of Marine Cooks and Stewards which, in case of disputes, also provides for appeals from the decision of employer and union representatives in Seattle, Portland, or San Pedro to the port committee at San Francisco. In a case of a deadlock—the employers and the union each have three members on the port committee—a final decision may be rendered by a referee, selected by the parties, if possible, or otherwise selected by the Conciliation Service of the United States Department of Labor.

The trucking industry: The Central States Employers Negotiating Committee representing some 800 common and contract carriers in 12 States have a master contract with the International Brotherhood of Teamsters which establishes for administrative purposes permanent State committees representing the two parties separately. Disputes not settled between the individual company and the union local are appealed to their appropriate State committees sitting jointly. Above them are permanent over-all area committees representing the two parties. These area committees sitting jointly are the highest agency for the settlement of disputes. Similar agreements are found in the Southern States, six-State agreement; New England, three-State agreement; and the Southwestern States, four-State agreement.

Mr. President, I wish to say, for the information of the President pro tempore, because I think he is entitled to a statement from me, that when I rose today to make a speech I thought certainly I could finish it in much less time than I have taken. But I believe the Chair is entitled to this explanation, that as I started to speak today there was still much of the speech in the typewriters, because I have been dictating night after night for some nights past, up to 2 o'clock this morning. Then from 8:30 a. m. until 11:30 o'clock this morning, when I came to the floor. There is more material than I originally thought, but I want to finish it this afternoon rather than proceed at some later date, in order that there may be some continuity to my statement and that it may appear in the RECORD in its entirety, because I think it will serve at least as a basis for reference so far as this very much-needed objective is concerned, if the Senate is to approach labor legislation in an intelligent and objective manner.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair thanks the Senator for the information; but what is the latest word from the Senator's typewriters?

Mr. MORSE. I think the typewriters have stopped pounding.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD at this point in my remarks a very excellent statement by Prof. Sumner H. Slichter, of Harvard University, who is, of course, one of the recognized authorities on labor-relations problems in the United States. I hope that every Member of the Senate will read what Professor Slichter has to say on the desirability of industry-wide bargaining.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

TO END STRIKES IN ESSENTIAL INDUSTRIES

(By Sumner H. Slichter, Lamont University professor at Harvard)

PROHIBIT INDUSTRY-WIDE BARGAINING

The proposal to prohibit industry-wide bargaining would obviously not reach the problem presented by electric light and power companies, gas companies, and telephone companies. In these cases there is usually only one company in a market. Even in other industries the prevention of industry-wide bargaining would not prevent industry-wide shut-downs. The United Steelworkers have no industry-wide contracts, and yet the union shut down the steel industry last winter by the simple process of terminating all of its contracts simultaneously.

The prohibition of industry-wide bargaining could impose a grievous burden on employers, because it would help unions pursue the policy of picking them off one by one. Employers who sought to protect themselves against this tactic by organizing and bargaining as a unit (as they have in many instances) would be halted by the prohibition of industry-wide bargaining. Many large employers, it is true, are strongly opposed to industry-wide bargaining, but for many small employers bargaining as a group is their only hope of gaining some rough equality with large and powerful unions.

LIMIT THE PROPORTION OF AN INDUSTRY WHICH SINGLE UNIONS MAY CONTROL

The proposals that unions be limited in the proportion of men or plants in an industry which they may organize have not been carefully worked out. Occasionally one meets the suggestion that unions be limited to a single company. This would mean over 150,000 unions in manufacturing alone. A less extreme proposal is that any union be prohibited from controlling more than a given fraction (say one-fourth or one-third) of the employees in an industry or an occupation.

Breaking up unions into several in each industry would not prevent the public from being completely deprived of service in such industries as electric light and power, gas, or telephone, where one company ordinarily serves an entire city or region. Even in railroading, breaking up the unions would fail to protect many thousands of communities from being completely deprived of railroad service because many towns have only one railroad.

In other industries three or four unions would be a headache. The unions would be either in competition or in collusion. Competition would make them tough customers for employers because each union would be afraid that its rivals would accuse it of being "reasonable" or "soft." Hence competition between unions for prestige and influence would produce bad industrial relations and would tend to increase strikes. Competition in the course of time would probably lead to collusion between the several unions. If that occurred the purpose of the policy of breaking up the unions would be defeated.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, I also ask to have printed at this point, as part of my remarks, an evaluation of the results of multiemployer bargaining; that is, some examples of opinion of employers and labor leaders, who are parties to labor contracts and who, it seems to me, are in an excellent position to inform the Senate as to how effective the contracts are.

There being no objection, the matter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

EVALUATION OF RESULTS OF MULTIEMPLOYER BARGAINING

Examples of opinions or statements of fact concerning:

National Association of Manufacturers of Pressed and Blown Glassware: "The instant case involved 47 companies and 18,000 employees in the pressed and blown glassware industry. The National Association of Manufacturers of Pressed and Blown Glassware represents the companies; The American Flint Glass Workers' Union, A. F. of L., represents the employees.

"The parties have had contractual relations since 1888, 1 year after the Union was first organized. Since that date all issues have been settled amicably with neither party resorting to strikes or lockouts to attain its aims." (From the opinion of the National War Labor Board in a case to determine a wage issue. In Re National Association of Manufacturers of Pressed and Blown Glassware and American Flint Glassworkers Union, A. F. of L., 18 War Labor Report 53, at page 54 (August 24, 1944).)

New England Trucking Employers (the Tri-State agreement covering 10 cities in Connecticut, Massachusetts, and Rhode Island had created a fair trade practice board to enforce and interpret the contract): "Both union and employer are unanimous in praise of the board. Both sides seem to feel that the benefits which they have derived from its operation have more than offset any possible losses.

"As for the union, the most important contribution which the board has made to locals has been to enable them to enforce their contracts. In past years employers frequently violated their contracts. In many cases locals were unable to do very much about the violations, partly because they did not know of them and partly because they could not afford to be continually involved in the controversies and strikes necessary to bring all employers into conformity with the agreement. The board has provided machinery by which locals can effectively ascertain the extent of suspected violations of the contract and obtain redress for them. The very existence of this machinery and the knowledge of the penalties which may be placed upon them has led many employers to comply with the contract. The result is that violations of the wage scale, use of nonunion men, overloading, and other practices contrary to the provisions of the agreement are rapidly being eliminated. The locals in this area have probably secured better compliance with their contracts than any other locals in New England.

"As indicated, the creation of the board and the observance of the no-strike provision of the contract has eliminated the many stoppages of work which formerly occurred during efforts to enforce contracts. This has benefited the locals by creating more friendly relations between employers and employees and has led to steadier work for the membership." (Samuel E. Hill, Teamsters and Transportation, Employee-Employer Relationships in New England (1942), pp. 220–221.)

New Bedford Cotton Manufacturers' Association: "Since about the beginning of the century members of the association and of its forerunner, the meetings of treasurers, have acted in unison in matters pertaining to wages, hours, and conditions of employment. Signed written collective-bargaining agreements with the (Textile Workers) Council have been continuously in force since 1938. For many years prior to 1938, verbal agreements evidenced by unsigned written memoranda had been made. All agreements were negotiated through the association and made upon an association-wide basis. When requests were made by a labor organization for collective bargaining they were referred to the association for consideration and action. Association bargaining was conducted not only with the (Textile Workers) Council but also with the teamsters, which, as far as the record discloses, was the only craft union outside the council which attempted to organize employees of the association members.

"This system of dealing has become traditional in the New Bedford cotton-textile industry, has proved conducive to the orderly functioning of collective bargaining, and has contributed to uniformity and stability of labor conditions not only among association mills but among other New Bedford mills of like class, which as a general rule have followed the lead of the association. With the exception of a 6-month strike in 1938, precipitated by an association decision to effect a 10-percent wage reduction and ultimately adjusted in negotiations conducted by the council with the association, and a strike of shorter duration in 1934, which was part of a national textile strike, the fine-goods textile industry in New Bedford has been singularly free from major industrial strife." (From the opinion of the National Labor Relations Board in a case to determine the appropriate bargaining unit. In the matter of New Bedford Cotton Manufacturers Association and Textile Workers Union of America (CIO), etc. (47 N. L. R. B. 1345 at p. 1351. Decided Mar. 5, 1943.)

Examples of opinions or statements of fact concerning:

The brewery proprietors of Milwaukee: "The union and the proprietors agree that this multiemployer method of bargaining has resulted in amicable labor relations throughout the city. There has been no labor dispute or work stoppage since the 1934 negotiations. Grievances, it was testified, were handled by the committee which negotiated the contract." (From the NLRB opinion in a case to determine the appropriate unit for collective bargaining. In the matter of Brewery Proprietors of Milwaukee, Wisconsin, and International Union of United Brewery, Flour, Cereal, and Soft Drink Workers of America and Its Local Brewery Workers Union No. 9 (June 7, 1945), 62 N. L. R. B. 163 at pp. 166–167.)

The Packers Association of Chicago: "The facts here presented demonstrate from the standpoint of effective collective bargaining and peaceful labor relations the desirability of an association-wide unit. Moreover, it clearly appears that all member companies have delegated to the association authority to engage in collective bargaining on their behalf and to enter into binding agreements with labor organizations." (From the NLRB opinion in a case to determine the appropriate bargaining unit. In the matter of Illinois Packing Co. and United Packinghouse Workers of America (56 N. L. R. B. 221 at pp. 223 and 226). Decided May 3, 1944.)

Pacific Coast Association of Pulp and Paper Manufacturers (comprising most of the pulp-and-paper industry in the Pacific Northwest): "This particular industry was selected for study because it has not experienced a single strike or lock-out since the workers were organized and collective bargaining was instituted. * * * It demonstrates that labor peace rests upon the ability of the industry to provide economic security and an acceptable standard of living, and adequate machinery to allow worker expression and participation in the establishment of working conditions. It shows what can be accomplished when good faith characterizes the relations of both employers and unions in their mutual dealings." (From John B. Appleton's preface to the study entitled "Labor Relations in the Pulp and Paper Industry in the Pacific Northwest," by Roger Randall (1942).)

Los Angeles County Painters and Decorators Joint Committee (representing three employers associations in the area): "Prior to the adoption of this and similar agreements, in their original form, there was chaos in the painting industry and there was no machinery requiring parties thereto to live up to the agreements made with respect to hours, wages, and working conditions. Persons would agree to observe collective bargaining and then ignore such agreements, compelling their competitors likewise to reduce wages and to ignore fair hours and working conditions." (From the preamble to the contract between the Los Angeles County Painters and Decorators Joint Committee and the District Council of Painters, No. 26, which is identical to article 22 of the contract between the Arizona chapter of the Painting and Decorating Contractors Association of America and Local No. 86 of the Brotherhood of Painters, Decorators, and Paperhangers of America.)

Southern soil pipe manufacturers: "The soil pipe manufacturing industry in the South is confined almost entirely to Alabama and Tennessee. Prior to 1934, labor conditions were unstable and wages, hours, and working conditions were not only unequal between the various foundries engaged in soil pipe manufacture but were often unequal for similar work performed in the same foundry. In 1934, following arrangements previously made between the representatives of 11 or 12 foundries in Alabama and Tennessee and the duly elected delegates and representatives of the molders, a conference was held between a committee representing the manufacturers and a committee representing the molders. At this meeting piece-rate wages were discussed and rates agreed upon for approximately 5,000 patterns of pipe and soil pipe fittings. These rates were reduced to writing. Thus, for the first time in the industry in the South, there was achieved a degree of uniformity in wage rates which served to stabilize and equalize working conditions. Subsequently similar conferences between the committees were held annually and semiannually resulting in each instance in increased wage rates and in reduced working hours.

"The bargaining upon this multiple-employer basis has achieved a considerable degree of stability in the industry in the South and has resulted in the adjustment of wages and hours on a uniform basis in marked contrast to the unsettled conditions existing prior to 1934." (From the opinion of the National Labor Relations Board in a case to determine the appropriate bargaining unit. In the matter of Central Foundry Co. and the United Steelworkers of America (CIO) (48 N. L. R. B. 5 at pp. 7 and 9). Decided March 11, 1943.)

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, I now offer a table showing the area of bargaining, with associations and groups of employers bargaining on a national or industry-wide scale. I am sure that many of the Members of the Senate will be surprised to learn that the best figures available show that bargaining on a national or industry-wide scale covers only 486,500 employees. I offer that exhibit, which I have labeled "Exhibit 3."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

(See exhibit 3.)

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, I also wish to offer for printing at this point in my remarks four brief memoranda which show the long history of industry-wide bargaining in the industries of pottery, pressed and blown glassware, women's clothing, and men's clothing. The reading of these memoranda, Mr. President, will show that this type of bargaining is not of recent development in the American labor movement. I offer it as exhibit 4.

There being no objection, the memoranda were ordered to be printed in the RECORD.

(See exhibit 4.)

Mr. MORSE. This type of bargaining has existed in some industries for a great many years; in some instances, such as the general ware and china branches of the pottery industry, since 1900.

I simply cannot believe that the Congress is going to upset years and years of experience with industry-wide bargaining, merely because some abuses here and there have crept into it. Abuses will not be found existing in the long-established industry-wide collective-bargaining contracts to the extent that they are creeping into many of the more recent industry-wide bargaining negotiations. I believe we can remedy the situation without destroying the right.

I speak advisedly, when I say, Mr. President, that in my judgment, if we pass S. 133, we will cause a great deal of damage to economic stability in this country, and we will injure not only good-faith collective bargaining on a multi-employer basis which is now working very successfully in many industries, but we will discourage what I think is one of the most desirable trends in employer-labor relations policies in this country, namely, the formation of employers' associations. I have been a strong advocate of such associations for many years. I advocated them when many segments of labor were particularly opposed to employer associations. However, I recognized that basic collective bargaining problems are not in many industries individual to the employers separately but that they have common interests in labor policies that affect the entire industry.

I notice that with the formation of employers' associations, resulting in joint arbitrations, for example, there was a decided increase in stability and responsibility within the industry. Hence, I think that S. 133 represents another attempt to turn back the hands of the clock and fails to take into account the realities of modern-day industry operating on a mass-production basis.

Now, Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have published at the end of my speech section an exhibit dealing with employer organizations and the extent of their participation in multi-company collective bargaining, a very fine memorandum which has been prepared for me by Secretary of Labor Schwellenbach through the services of Mr. Boris Stern and his staff. I hope that members of the Senate will read this memorandum when they come to consider S. 133.

There being no objection, the memorandum was ordered to be printed in the RECORD.

(See exhibit 5.)

Mr. MORSE. I may say, Mr. President, that in offering objective data and memoranda for the RECORD, I have done so on the assumption, which I know to be well-founded, that, after all, the Members of this body do want to have and will appreciate having a ready source of reference and vital material which is available to us through Government agencies on the very important labor questions raised by proposed legislation. So I have sought in this manner to give to the Members of the Senate, with such interpretations and evaluations as I see fit to place upon them, what I think is very valuable source material which can be used in the debates which are to ensue.

Before closing my comments on S. 133, I want to mention the fact, Mr. President, that the passage of the bill would create some very serious problems insofar as administering the Wagner Act is concerned. A very clear statement of the effects of S. 133 on the Wagner Act was made before the committee the other day by the chairman of the National Labor Relations Board, Mr. Paul M. Herzog.

I shall not take the time of the Senate to read the statement, which is to be found on pages 75 through 78 of the prepared statement which Mr. Herzog submitted to the committee the other morning. However, I do ask, Mr. President, permission to have his statement printed at this point of my remarks, as exhibit 6.

I wish to associate myself with Mr. Herzog's analysis of the situation because I think the problems which he points out insofar as the effects of S. 133 upon the National Labor Relations Act are so serious in nature that we cannot justify ignoring them.

There being no objection, Mr. Herzog's prepared statement, exhibit 6, was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 133, THE INDUSTRY-WIDE BARGAINING BILL

S. 133, introduced by Senator BALL, deals with the problem of industry-wide bargaining. The bill would make it an unfair labor practice for an employer to bargain with a union representing employees of any other employer engaged in the same industry or activity "unless the principal places of employment of the employees of such employers are located in the same labor market area" (sec. 2 (a)). Section 3 of the bill makes unions ineligible under the National Labor Relations Act to act as bargaining representatives for employees of competing employers under the same circumstances, and section 2 (a) makes such representation by a union an unfair labor practice. A labor market area is defined in section 4 of the bill as a metropolitan or other geographical area within which a majority of the employees regularly employed by the employer in that area reside within a maximum diameter of 100 miles.

In addition to the foregoing, the bill would make unlawful certain types of control over or joint action between labor organizations in collective bargaining. The bill also forbids employers to bargain collectively through any group, committee, or association of employees in the same industry unless all are located within the same labor-market area. These latter prohibitions are enforced by injunctions, with the provisions of the Clayton Act and the Norris-LaGuardia Act declared inapplicable.

The amendments to the National Labor Relations Act proposed in S. 133 would affect the work of the Board in at least two important respects. In the first place, the bill would limit the Board's authority to include the employees of more than one employer in the same bargaining unit. Although this is rarely done in practice, discretion to do so is essential if the Board is to administer the act in accord with prevailing custom, rather than carve up units which made for efficient collective bargaining. Under the act, as presently written, the Board has included within a single unit the employees of more than one employer in two types of situations:

First. Where two or more companies are operated as a single business enterprise, with the direct control of labor relations vested in a single source, and where the other facts in the case make the broader unit advisable, the Board has included the employees of all the companies in a single bargaining unit. See National Labor Relations Board v. Lund (103 F. 2d 815 (C. C. A. 8)), where the Court approved such a unit determination by the Board.

Second. Where a group of employers engaged in the same industry has already delegated to a trade association or other employers' organization the right to bargain collectively with a labor organization representing the employees, and where the history of collective bargaining has been on a multiple-employer basis the Board has established a single employer unit consisting of all the employees of the members of the trade association or employers' organization. It has done so, however, only when the history of collective bargaining in the industry shows the necessity and desirability of such unit from the standpoint of effective collective bargaining and peaceful labor relations.[1] Illustrative of the type of case in which the Board has recognized the appropriateness of a multiple-employer unit is the case of Matter of Rayonier, Inc., Grays Harbor Division (52 N. L. R. B. 1269), in which the Board considered as determinative the facts that the members of an association covering employers in the States of California, Oregon, and Washington "had established a practice of joint action in regard to labor relations by negotiation with an effective employee organization, and [had] by their customary adherence to the uniform labor agreements resulting therefrom demonstrated their desire to be bound by group rather than by individual action."[2]

S. 133 would prevent the Board from finding such units appropriate except where the plants involved were located within the same "labor market area" as required by the bill. We think that a restriction of this kind is undesirable, for it would require the Board in many cases to issue certifications and orders in conflict with existing practices of collective bargaining that are apparently satisfactory to the employers and to the majority of employees involved, and would disrupt and break up existing forms of collective bargaining that have functioned effectively for many years.[3]

We shall not review the arguments for or against industry-wide and region-wide bargaining. These have been fully presented to the committee. We are concerned only with impact of the bill upon the Wagner Act. Suffice it to say that in many cases that come before the Board the broader unit undoubtedly better effectuates collective bargaining. Thus, in the case of affiliated companies, the employees of all companies frequently have identical interests and identical problems. In such cases, the technicalities of corporate structure have no relation to collective bargaining realities. Likewise, in the case of different employers, the employees may, as in the case of longshoremen, work for one employer one day and another the next. In these cases the employees are in reality employed by the employers as a group. Under such circumstances, and particularly where collective bargaining has in fact been historically on a multiple-employer basis, the broader unit is desirable. We do not believe the Board should be restricted by the proposed amendments by prohibiting the designation of such a unit.[4] The problem is one that can be properly solved only by an administrative agency equipped to make individual determination upon the basis of facts as they arise in each case.

The second important respect in which the bill would affect the work of the Board is to increase substantially the number of cases coming before the Board, while at the same time making the expeditious processing of such cases difficult if not impossible. Employers, in order to be certain that they are not violating the new law, would be likely to request a Board certification before bargaining or continuing to bargain with an union; only by a Board certificate of recent origin could an employer be sure that the union had not expanded beyond the labor-market area. The Board would thus be faced with hundreds, and perhaps thousands, of representation cases whenever contracts expired. In each such case, as well as in cases arising under section 2 of the bill and under the refusal to bargain section 8 (5) of the National Labor Relations Act, the Board would have to determine whether the union represented employees of employers in the same industry or activity; and, if so, whether the employers were located in the same labor-market area. The Board would also have to determine through the addresses of all employees (not only those of the employer involved but also of many others with whom the union was bargaining) whether a majority of the employees resided in the labor-market area. Obviously, the necessity for

[1] Cursory examination of the Board's records reveals that multiple-employer units were found appropriate in only 10 cases during fiscal 1946.

[2] For a detailed analysis of Board decisions on multiple-employer units see Fourth Annual Report, N. L. R. B. (1939), pp. 92–93; Fifth Annual Report (1940), p. 69; Sixth Annual Report (1941), pp. 67–69; Ninth Annual Report (1944), pp. 34–35; Tenth Annual Report (1945), pp. 29–30. The most recent Board decisions on this issue are Matter of Waterfront Employers' Association et al. (71 N. L. R. B. 80); Matter of Waterfront Employers' Association et al. (71 N. L. R. B. 121); Matter of California Metal Trades Association et al. (72 N. L. R. B. No. 120); and Matter of California State Brewers' Institute et al. (72 N. L. R. B. No. 127).

[3] It is estimated that in this country more than 4,000,000 workers are covered by agreements negotiated with associations and groups of employers. Most of the agreements are products of peaceful employer-union relations of several years duration. It is estimated, too, that there are more than 5,000 employer associations and groups of employers engaged in collective bargaining. Many of these would be outlawed by S. 133.

[4] Indeed, several years ago the New York State Legislature, acting upon the recommendation of the Ives committee, extended the authority of the State board to make certain that it could find multiple-employer and association-wide units appropriate.

making such determinations would seriously encumber the processing of Board cases. Indeed, the ascertainment of the residence of each employee is in itself a formidable problem. We think that these difficulties are sufficiently serious to make the workability of S. 133 highly questionable. For this reason and because we believe that the bill might seriously impair existing labor-management relations, we urge that the bill not be enacted into law.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, with regard to Senate bill 55, introduced by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. TAFT], the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. BALL], and the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. SMITH], many of the observations I have made in connection with my discussion of Senate bill 360 are equally applicable. This is especially true with regard to the provisions whereby strikers lose their status as employees. As pointed out by Chairman Herzog, in his testimony before the committee last week, under sections 204 (a) and 205 (a) of S. 55 it would be illegal for employees to strike if the labor organization has failed to comply with the registration of provisions. Moreover, if employees strike during the cooling-off period provided by section 3 (b) of title I of S. 55, they automatically lose their status as employees and under section 3 (e) of the same title subject to ex parte injunctions and treble damage actions.

Mr. President, I now turn to some of the proposals which I think should be made by way of amendment to the Wagner Act.

The bill which I am now introducing falls into four general topics:

First. It defines several new unfair labor practices with regard to labor organizations and their agents and also corrects certain deficiencies in the present unfair labor practice sections of the Wagner Act; and

Second. It provides for the expansion of the Board from three to seven members in view of the increased amount of work placed upon the Board and also permits the Board to operate in departments; and Third. The bill guarantees employers and all other persons affected by the Wagner Act their constitutional right to freedom of speech; and Fourth. It permits the Board as the expert agency of the Federal Government dealing with labor relations to seek injunctive relief in the Federal circuit courts of appeals to restrain the unfair labor practices of both employers and employees in instances where the Board is persuaded that the situation demands speedy relief.

I shall first describe the new provisions defining unfair labor practices by labor organizations or their agents. Just as the Wagner Act now makes it unfair for an employer to interfere with or restrain his employees in the exercise of their right to select their collective-bargaining representative, so I propose that it be an unfair labor practice for labor organizations, or their agents, to interfere with, restrain, or coerce an employer in the selection of his bargaining representative.

Secondly, I have attempted to define as unfair labor practices certain types of strikes, jurisdictional disputes, and secondary boycotts. These provisions are in section 4 (d) of the bill. It is thereby made an unfair labor practice for a union, or its agents, "to engage, or to induce or encourage the employees of any employer to engage, in a strike or in a concerted refusal" to use, transport, or handle goods or to perform any services in the course of their employment, if the stoppage or action is directed at certain objectives. For example, it would be an unfair labor practice to strike or boycott in furtherance of a jurisdictional dispute regarding the performance of a particular work task by members of one union or another. As I have said before, these jurisdictional disputes are generally unjustifiable and need to be corrected. Another objective for which it will be illegal to strike or engage in a boycott is one designed to compel any employer to disregard a certification issued by the Board. Under the present law an employer who is under a duty to recognize and bargain with one union by reason of a Board election and certification can obtain no relief from the Board or the courts if the union which lost the election chooses to strike or boycott in an effort to have the employer disregard the obligation placed upon him by reason of the Board certification. Another objective which it seems to me is not defensible is that involved in a secondary boycott designed to force an employer to recognize a union. By this device, labor unions attempt to organize employer A by bringing economic pressure to bear upon employer B. It seems to me that with the democratic election machinery of the Wagner Act available, and with the provisions according Federal protection to employees in their efforts to organize, it is no longer legitimate for labor to engage in this type of conduct. A related type of secondary boycott which I think should be made an unfair labor practice, is one designed to compel another employer to bargain with a particular labor organization or to force any of his employees to become or cease being members of a particular labor organization. Here, again, I believe that resort should be had to the machinery of the act and to peaceful collective bargaining.

The third type of unfair labor practice covered by this bill is that arising out of expulsion of employees from membership in a union which has a closed shop contract with an employer, when the reason for the expulsion is that the employee has exercised his democratic right to change bargaining representatives. The Board can now remedy such conduct only by the indirect method of issuing an order against the employer who in response to a union demand discharges that employee after he has been expelled from the union. The Board can correct such conduct in this indirect fashion only when the facts show that the employer had knowledge that the contracting union expelled the employee for exercising his rights under the act. To the extent that the union is solely responsible for the discharge, I think it should be answerable. If both the employer and the union are responsible, both should be answerable. In the interest of maintaining contractual and industrial stability however, it is desirable that employees be free to engage in activity designed to change representatives only at appropriate times. I have, therefore, protected such activity only when it occurs "at a time when a question concerning representation may appropriately be raised." The purpose here is to write into law the principle now followed by the Board of allowing election petitions to be filed near the end of the contract period.

Much has been said in the hearings that have just been completed concerning the obligation of unions to bargain collectively. While it seems to me that unions would seldom refuse to engage in collective bargaining since that is one of the primary, if not the primary, reasons for their existence, I can see no valid objection to imposing that duty upon them by law. I therefore propose that it be made an unfair labor practice for a union to refuse to bargain collectively after it has been certified by the Board as the exclusive representative. It should be observed, however, that the duty imposed upon the union is the same as that imposed upon the employer—no greater, no less.

Finally, I propose that it be made an unfair labor practice for a union to violate the terms of a collective-bargaining agreement or the terms of an agreement to submit a labor dispute to arbitration. In this connection I am also proposing that similar conduct by an employer be made an unfair-labor practice. While it is my view that unions and employers should settle their contractual disputes by collective bargaining and voluntary arbitration, I recognize the force of the argument that existing law affords only nebulous remedies to employers as well as unions in case the other party has violated the contract. Should such a provision be adopted by the Congress it will be my hope that the Board would devise regulations and pursue a policy which would minimize the number of contract violation cases accepted under these proposals.

I digress a moment to stress this point: I do not know how one could be more explicit than I have been over the years, both in statements and by decisions, that when a union signs its John Henry to a labor contract that signature should be lived up to in all respects, as should the signature of the employer. I have never held a brief for labor unions or for employers who violate labor contracts. I am seeking here to provide machinery and procedures whereby the National Labor Relations Board will have jurisdiction to take cognizance of charges filed by employers alleging the unfair labor practice of violating a contract. I think that will involve primarily a question of fact in both instances. Under my proposal, as I see it, it would become the duty of the Board to determine whether or not the parties have exhausted their remedies under their own contract, and, if they have not, they should be ordered to do so. Having such a law on the statute books would in and of itself have a very salutary effect, in my judgment, because I noticed, as a member of the War Labor Board during the war, that there was tremendous opposition to our exercising jurisdiction over certain types of work stoppages, such as the jurisdictional dispute, which we knew could not be justified on any basis by those participating in the dispute. I remember very clearly a night when we had a very serious stoppage of work in one of the vital war plants of the country because of a jurisdictional dispute. I then proposed that unless the workers went back to work at the next shift the Board should appoint an arbitrator whose decision should be final and binding. Labor vigorously opposed my position.

In that particular case the Board took a recess, and in 10 minutes one of the labor representatives came back and stated that the men had been ordered back to work by the union. That is the way they preferred it. That is the way I prefer it, too. But we could not take a chance. Therefore, I offered a resolution, which became the policy of the Board, with labor dissenting at the time it was adopted, which provided that for the duration of the life of the War Labor Board we would give the union leaders involved in a jurisdictional dispute 24 hours to proceed to settle the dispute without a work stoppage, and upon their failure to do so we would appoint an arbitrator whose decision would be final and binding.

What I wish to stress is the remarkable compliance we obtained so far as the quick settlement of jurisdictional disputes was concerned, once the resolution became the policy and procedure of the Board.

I think it ought to be frankly stated here this afternoon that probably one of the greatest benefits that will come from the adoption of such amendments to the Wagner Act as I am proposing this afternoon will be action on the part of the unions themselves to see to it that it does not become necessary, unless in exceptional cases, to resort to the machinery which I have proposed in these amendments. I am not being fooled in regard to this question. The point I wish to emphasize is that I believe that declaring certain actions to be unfair labor practices will be preventive of some of the abuses which we seek to cure, because the unions themselves will proceed to establish within their own organizations machinery capable of settling such disputes short of economic action. If that will be the effect of this amendment, it certainly will be more than justified. There will be available to employers a procedural remedy, when unions violate their contracts and are not willing to exhaust the procedures provided for in the terms of the contracts prior to resorting to economic action.

It would be a great mistake for the Federal Government to undertake to adjudicate as unfair labor practices all alleged violations of collective bargaining contracts. Certainly this procedure should not be used until the parties have exhausted the remedies available under their contract or through voluntary arbitration.

As I have previously stated, greater fairness in the administration of the Wagner Act will be obtained if an employer is permitted to file a petition with the Board and obtain an election. Although the act as presently written in section 9 does not preclude the Board from accepting an employer petition, nevertheless, by its rules and regulations the Board allows an employer to file a petition for an election only when conflicting demands for recognition have been presented to him by two or more labor organizations.

I propose, therefore, to amend section 9 of the act so as to permit any party in interest, including an employer, to request an election. However, I recognize that such a right may be subject to abuse, in that employers may seek an election at the earliest possible moment in an organizational campaign and thereby obtain a vote rejecting the union before it has had a reasonable opportunity to organize.

Therefore I would limit the employer's right to file a petition to those situations in which the union has made a claim to be recognized as the exclusive bargaining representative or where, near the end of a contract, bona fide doubt exists that the union which has the contract continues to be the exclusive representative. In the latter type of situation my proposal would require the employer to file his petition at least 30 days before the expiration of the contract. The purpose of this is to prevent abuse of the right to petition and to avoid an hiatus in the collective-bargaining relationship.

In order to assist the Board in the additional duties that would be placed upon it by the proposals I have outlined above, my bill would increase the membership from three to seven, and also empower the Board to act in sections of not less than three members. With an adequate budget and staff, as well as an augmented membership, the Board would be in a position to handle its work more speedily. Also, four additional members on the Board would have the effect of obtaining a better and more representative collective judgment from the Board. I think it only fair to point out that should the Congress create such an enlarged Board, which I think will be absolutely essential if we broaden the jurisdiction of the Board to cover unfair labor practices on the part of unions as well as employers, it must have more money with which to function. I do not desire to discuss this point at length today, but I want to state a conclusion. I have gone into the question, and I want to say that one of the reasons—and I think a primary reason—for the Board being from 18 to 20 months behind with its docket in many cases, is that the Congress has not given to the Board adequate appropriations to do the job that needs to be done if it is to be done. I do not know of any field in which time is more important than in the field of handling a labor case in the quickest possible time. It is delay which gives rise to doubts, suspicions, and discontent within the ranks of labor. Frequently we find that strikes are actually called against the Board. Hotheads lose their judgment in the union meeting and walk out in protest because they have been waiting for months for the Board's determination of a representation case, for example. Human beings are that way; and so time is of the essence in settling these highly volatile disputes. If we are to have quicker action, we must be willing, through appropriations, to give to the Board the money necessary to maintain the staff necessary to do the job quickly. I say that is a wise expenditure of money, because when a labor dispute is settled quickly the country is saved many times the cost of settling it by way of its proportionate share of the budget appropriated by the Congress for the Board.

So in fairness to the Board, I want to emphasize the importance of our acting very carefully when we approach our appropriation problems this year in the matter of making available to the National Labor Relations Board, particularly if we broaden its jurisdiction and give it greater duties and obligations to perform, sufficient money with which to do the job.

Mr. President, the question of employers' freedom of speech has generated a great deal of heat in the hearings before the Senate committee. It is, of course, self-evident that neither the Board nor the courts can impair the right of free speech guaranteed in the Constitution. It is my impression that those who propose legislation designed to enlarge the employer's right to express his views to his employees are not so much interested in vindicating their constitutional rights as they are in obtaining statutory immunity for acts and conduct which in fact interfere with and coerce employees. If for no other purpose than to correct a widespread misconception and at the same time to impress upon the Board its obligation under the Constitution, I propose that a new subsection be added to the unfair labor practice section of the Wagner Act specifically guaranteeing that all persons—employers as well as unions—are to be protected in their right of free speech.

Specifically, my amendment would provide that nothing in the act "shall be construed to interfere with the right to freedom of speech as guaranteed by the first amendment to the Constitution"; in addition, the provision would prohibit the Board from finding "that the making of any statement of views or arguments, either written or oral, constitutes an unfair labor practice, if such statement by itself or in its context contains no threat of force or economic reprisals."

I have been considerably troubled by various proposals which have been made to obtain speedy relief from unfair labor practices, particularly proposals dealing with injunctive relief against conduct by unions and employees. As I stated earlier in this speech, some of these proposals would revive the days of the midnight injunction, treble-damage actions against unions and employees, and severe criminal penalties. On the other hand, I must admit that there is considerable merit in the argument that in many instances of serious and widespread labor disputes the Government is in large part impotent to correct the conditions which have led to the serious interruption of commerce.

To my mind it is necessary to initiate legislation that will permit the Government, through the NLRB, to obtain speedy judicial relief when labor disputes which involve unfair labor practices threaten seriously to impair vital sections of the national economy. I have several proposals designed to strengthen the Government in these situations.

First, in the case of jurisdictional disputes involving who shall perform particular tasks, I propose that the Board be empowered to appoint an arbitrator to settle the matter unless within 10 days the parties satisfy the Board that the dispute has been adjusted or that agreement has been reached for the voluntary adjustment of the dispute. After the arbitrator has rendered his award, which is to be filed with the Board, if the parties comply the unfair labor practice charge will be dismissed. One of the reasons I suggest that an arbitrator be available to handle such jurisdictional disputes is that time is of the essence, and the regular procedure of the Board for hearing and judicial enforcement would not remedy the evil sought to be corrected.

Another change in the remedies available to the Board, which I propose, would permit the Board to obtain a temporary injunction or restraining order from the courts of appeal after the Board has issued a complaint but before it has held a hearing and issued an order. Since it is the duty of the Board to prevent unfair labor practices, the Board should have adequate authority to discharge that duty expeditiously.

My proposal would in no way impair the legitimate rights of labor under the Norris-LaGuardia Act and the Clayton Act, since I do not propose that employers be allowed to obtain injunctions against labor or that unions and their members be subjected to the drastic civil and criminal penalties that could be applied in days gone by. Should my proposal become law, it will, of course, be necessary for the Board to exercise an informed discretion in administering the law to the end that labor and industry will be encouraged to adjust their differences by the peaceful methods of collective bargaining.

Therefore, Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent at this time to introduce a labor bill which consists of proposed amendments to the Wagner Act, and ask to have it printed in the RECORD at this point as a part of my remarks.

There being no objection, the bill (S. 858) to amend the National Labor Relations Act, introduced by Mr. MORSE, was received, read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 1 of the National Labor Relations Act is amended by inserting before the last paragraph in such section a new paragraph as follows:

"Experience has further demonstrated that certain practices by labor organizations, their officers and members, have the intent or the necessary effect of burdening or obstructing commerce by preventing the free flow of goods in such commerce through strikes and other forms of industrial unrest or through concerted activities which impair the interest of the public in the free flow of such commerce. The elimination of such practices is a necessary condition to the assurance of the rights herein guaranteed."

SEC. 2. (a) Paragraph (1) of section 2 of such act is amended by inserting after the word "includes" the words "labor organizations, their officers, and employees or members, and."

(b) Paragraph (2) of such section is amended by inserting before the period at the end thereof a colon and the following: "Provided, That for the purposes of section 9 (b) hereof, the term 'employer' shall not include a group of employers except where such employers have voluntarily associated themselves together for the purposes of collective bargaining."

(c) Paragraph (3) of such section is amended by inserting before the period at the end thereof the following: "or any individual employed in agriculture (as defined in section 3 (f) of the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938)."

SEC. 3. (a) The first sentence of subsection (a) of section 3 of such act is amended by striking out the word "three" and inserting in lieu thereof the word "seven".

(b) The second sentence in such subsection is amended to read as follows: "The terms of office of members of the Board shall be 5 years except that any individual chosen to fill a vacancy occurring prior to the expiration of the term for which his predecessor was appointed shall be appointed only for the unexpired portion of such term."

(c) Subsection (b) of such section is amended to read as follows:

"(b) The Board is authorized to delegate to any group of three or more members any or all of the powers which it may itself exercise. A vacancy in the Board shall not impair the right of the remaining members to exercise all of the powers of the Board, and four members of the Board shall, at all times, constitute a quorum of the Board, except that two members shall constitute a quorum of any group designated pursuant to the first sentence hereof. The Board shall have an official seal which shall be judicially noticed."

(d) The first sentence of subsection (a) of section 4 of such act is amended by striking out "$10,000" and inserting in lieu thereof "$12,000."

SEC. 4. (a) Paragraph (2) of section 8 of such act is amended by inserting before the period at the end thereof a comma and the following: "or from adopting nondiscriminatory rules forbidding union activity by employees on company time and property which interferes with the business of the employer."

(b) Paragraph (4) of such subsection is amended by inserting before the word "testimony" the words "statements or."

(c) Such section is amended by adding after paragraph (5) thereof a new paragraph as follows:

"(6) To violate the terms of a collective-bargaining agreement or the terms of an agreement to submit a labor dispute to arbitration: Provided, That the Board may dismiss any charge made pursuant to this paragraph if the labor organization has violated the terms of such agreement or has failed to comply with an order of the Board."

(d) Such section is further amended by inserting after the section number the letter (a), and by adding at the end thereof the following new subsection:

"(b) It shall be an unfair labor practice for a labor organization or its agents—

"(1) To interfere with, restrain, or coerce an employer in the selection of his representatives for the purposes of collective bargaining.

"(2) To engage, or to induce or encourage the employees of any employer to engage, in a strike or in a concerted refusal to use, manufacture, process, transport, or otherwise handle or work on any goods, articles, materials, or commodities or to perform any services, in the course of their employment (A) because particular work tasks of such employer or any other employer are performed by employees who are or are not members of a particular labor organization, (B) because such employer or any other employer has refused to recognize or bargain with a particular labor organization as the representative of his employees, if another labor organization has been certified as the representative of such employees within the meaning of section 9 (a), (C) because some or all of the employees of any other employer are or are not members of a particular labor organization, or (D) because any other employer does not have an agreement with, or will not bargain with, a particular labor organization as the representative of some or all of his employees.

"(3) To expel any employee from membership in any labor organization holding a contract with his employer which requires membership in such labor organization as a condition of employment, because such employee has engaged in activity on behalf of another labor organization at a time when a question concerning representation may appropriately be raised; or to persuade or attempt to persuade his employer to discriminate against such employee.

"(4) To refuse, after certification as exclusive representative by the Board, to bargain collectively with the representatives of an employer.

"(5) To violate the terms of a collective bargaining agreement or the terms of an agreement to submit a labor dispute to arbitration; Provided, That the Board may dismiss any charge made pursuant to this paragraph if the employer has violated the terms of such agreement or has failed to comply with an order of the Board.

"(c) Nothing herein shall be construed to interfere with the right to freedom of speech as guaranteed by the first amendment to the Constitution of the United States; nor shall the Board find that the making of any statement of views or arguments, either written or oral, constitutes an unfair labor practice if such statement by itself or in its context contains no threat of force or economic reprisal."

(e) The caption preceding sections 7 and 8 of such act is amended to read as follows: "Rights of employees and employers."

SEC. 5. (a) Subsection (a) of section 9 of such act is amended by inserting before the period at the end thereof a comma and the following: "and to adjust such grievances without the intervention of the bargaining representative, if after notification such representative does not indicate a desire to participate in such adjustment."

(b) Subsection (c) of such section is amended by adding at the end thereof the following: "Any party in interest, including an employer, may request such an investigation. The Board shall not proceed on the request of an employer unless it appears (1) that one or more persons or labor organizations have made a claim to be recognized as the representative within the meaning of subsection (a) or (2) that there is a bona fide doubt that the labor organization last recognized in a collective-bargaining contract is the representative within the meaning of subsection (a) and the request is filed with the Board at least 30 days prior to the expiration of such contract."

SEC. 6. (a) Subsection (a) of section 10 of such act is amended by inserting before the period at the end thereof a colon and the following: "Provided, That the Board is empowered, by agreement with any agency of any State or Territory, to concede to such agency jurisdiction over any cases arising in industries not basic to the national economy even though such cases may involve labor disputes affecting commerce."

(b) Such section is further amended by adding at the end thereof the following new subsections:

"(j) The Board shall have power, upon issuance of a complaint as provided in subsection (b) charging that any person has engaged in or is engaging in an unfair labor practice, to petition any circuit court of appeals of the United States (including the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia), of if all the circuit courts of appeals to which application may be made are in vacation, any district court of the United States (including the District Court of the United States for the District of Columbia), within any circuit or district, respectively, wherein the unfair labor practice in question is alleged to have occurred or wherein such person resides or transacts business, for appropriate temporary relief or restraining order. Upon the filing of any such petition the court shall cause notice thereof to be served upon such person, and thereupon shall have exclusive jurisdiction to grant to the Board such temporary relief or restraining order as it deems just and proper.

"(k) Whenever it is charged that any person has engaged in an unfair labor practice within the meaning of paragraph (2) (A) of section 8 (b), the Board is empowered to hear and determine the dispute out of which such unfair labor practice shall have arisen or to appoint an arbitrator to hear and determine such dispute, unless, within 10 days after notice that such charge has been filed, the parties to such dispute submit to the Board satisfactory evidence that they have adjusted or agreed upon methods for the voluntary adjustment of the dispute. Upon compliance by the parties to the dispute with the decision of the Board or the arbitrator appointed by the Board or upon such voluntary adjustment of the dispute, such charge shall be dismissed."

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, I also ask unanimous consent to introduce another bill, which does not relate to amendments to the Wagner Act but seeks to provide the Senate with the data, the facts, and the information needed as to what is going on in the country in regard to entering into labor contracts. I am introducing a bill to provide for keeping the Congress fully informed of current developments in the field of collective bargaining and labor-management relations, in order to provide basic information needed by management and labor organizations when engaged in collective bargaining.

There being no objection, the bill (S. 859) to provide for keeping the Congress fully informed on current developments in the field of collective bargaining and labor-management relations; to provide basic information needed by management and labor organizations when engaged in collective bargaining; and to aid conciliation, mediation, arbitration, and other Government agencies in the process of settling or preventing labor-management disputes and work stoppages, introduced by Mr. MORSE, was received, read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, I have only a few brief remarks to make by way of explanation of the bill.

Although collective bargaining has by now become an accepted institution in the United States, labor-management relations have continued to be one of our major national problems, and at times so serious a problem as to threaten the very stability of our social and economic life. At the present time the Congress of the United States is called upon to deal with this grave situation, and the Senate Committee on Labor and Public Welfare is holding hearings on a number of bills intended to provide a solution for our labor-management difficulties.

Unfortunately, however, the testimony heard so far has proved to be largely of the kind which may be classified as either "entirely black" or "entirely white." Judging by the statements of some of those who are opposed to organized labor in general, there is nothing good in the trade union movement, and the sooner unions are abolished altogether the happier the country will be. On the other hand, some of the labor leaders who testified before the committee took the exact opposite position; namely, that there is nothing wrong with the labor movement, and there is absolutely no need for any legislation or other Government action to deal with the problem of labor-management relations.

As is usually the case in such situations, the truth lies somewhere between those two extremes. We do need some labor legislation, but we also need considerably more factual information than we have at the present time, in order to determine how far we can go by means of legislation in handling the delicate problem of human relations in industry.

Not enough of such information is available at the present time. For a number of years the Bureau of Labor Statistics, the fact-finding agency of the United States Department of Labor, has attempted to develop some information pertaining to labor-management problems, but the Bureau's authority to collect information is so extremely limited that it has been compelled to rely on antiquated methods of collecting the necessary data, with very inadequate results. The material on labor relations prepared by the Bureau of Labor Statistics is, therefore, generally of the type of "too little and too late."

Take, for instance, the Bureau of Labor Statistics' reports on work stoppages, which frequently are cited and quoted on the floor of the Senate. Many Senators probably will be shocked to learn that this information is based, not on a direct reporting system to the Department of Labor, but on newspaper clippings from which the Bureau obtains its clues as to where and when a work stoppage occurs. Take away the clipping service from the Bureau of Labor Statistics and you automatically deprive it of its major source of strike information and make it impossible for the Bureau to issue any reports on work stoppages. Such a situation actually occurred in 1943, when the Bureau of Labor Statistics was compelled to cease publication of strike data for a period of from 3 to 4 months.

In this connection I want to emphasize that, by and large, strikes are still regarded as important news and, therefore, are reported, often in great detail, in the daily press. As a result the information on work stoppages published by the Bureau of Labor Statistics may be regarded as actually reflecting conditions that exist in the country. This, however, is not true of the collective-bargaining agreements and of the settlements of labor-management disputes before they reach the stage of a work stoppage. Such information is generally not reported in the daily press; and because we have no adequate information on the peaceful phases of collective bargaining, the Bureau of Labor Statistics' reports on work stoppages have been justly criticized as "lopsided," as placing undue emphasis on labor-management disputes, and as paying no attention whatever to the far larger area of cooperative and peaceful relations that characterize the day-to-day life of our industrial community.

In the United States, labor and management are not required by tradition or by law to file with the United States Department of Labor copies of their collective-bargaining agreements; and the Bureau of Labor Statistics is, therefore, compelled to use the costly and antiquated method of writing to each employer and to the union concerned each time it learns of the existence of an agreement between them. In this way the Bureau of Labor Statistics has managed, in the course of the last few years, to build up a file of approximately 15,000 collective-bargaining agreements currently in effect. But neither the Bureau, nor anyone else for that matter, has any knowledge as to how many agreements are actually in existence in this country at any one time, or how many new agreements are concluded each month and how many are revised or renewed each month.

I am reliably informed that the United States is the only English-speaking country that has not given its Department of Labor the necessary authority and facilities to provide this type of information, which is needed by us for legislative purposes and is needed by labor and management groups who are engaged in collective bargaining. In England such agreements are filed with the Department of Labor as a matter of course. In Canada some Provinces require, by law, that all agreements be registered with the Government agency, and such agreements do not become valid until so registered.

There is still a third field of labor information which we must have if we are to deal intelligently with the problem of labor-management relations. I refer to the data on the growth and development of the trade-union movement in the United States, on union membership, on the amount of initiation fees, dues, fines, and other assessments collected by the union from its members, and on the various types of services and benefits rendered to the members.

Again we are the only English-speaking nation where the Department of Labor does not collect and officially publish such information. For years Great Britain has been publishing annual reports on the trade-union movement, and Canada has been issuing an annual report ever since 1910. In fact, some of our own States, notably California and Massachusetts, have been, for a number of years, publishing annual reports on the trade-union development within their own borders. It is indeed high time that the Federal Department of Labor be instructed to provide this type of information, which we could use most effectively at the present time when we are confronted with the serious problem of what we should or should not do to put labor-management relations in this country on an even keel.

The bill I am introducing today is intended to correct the situation. I am, of course, fully aware that to accomplish this aim we may have to provide additional facilities, and also may have to increase the appropriation allotted to the Bureau of Labor Statistics for its work on industrial relations. We may perhaps be required to double the $250,000 spent last year by the Bureau of Labor Statistics to provide information on industrial relations. The furnishing of such information would be a major feat to accomplish in a year when all of us are concerned with reducing and balancing the budget. Nevertheless, I feel that such an investment in providing authentic information on collective bargaining and on labor-management relations will more than pay for itself in dividends in terms of enlarging the area of industrial peace and reducing the area of industrial strife.

My reasons for this statement are direct and simple. If we are to retain our democratic way of life based on free enterprise, we must, of necessity, also retain the institution of free and strong unions and free collective bargaining. This means that, whether we like it or not, we are always going to have some strikes. In fact, the existence of such strikes may be regarded as a sign that our free democratic institutions are actually functioning. The only countries that I know of which have successfully eliminated strikes are Fascist Italy, Nazi Germany, and Communist Russia. There were no strikes under fascism in Italy and Germany and there are none under communism in Russia, but neither are there free unions, private enterprise, or any of our traditional liberties which constitute the very essence of our American way of life.

I am firmly of the opinion that we cannot legislate strikes out of existence. However, we can greatly reduce industrial strife, reduce the number of work stoppages, and minimize the disturbances to our economy caused by such work stoppages, partly by means of wise legislation and partly by the use of common sense and mutual trust on the part of labor and management. The information called for in the proposed bill should make a very substantial contribution in that direction, in my judgment.

Mr. President, I close my address both with thanks to my colleagues and with an apology on my lips. I wish to thank my colleagues who have patiently heard me through on the vital subject I have been discussing. I wish to apologize for taking so long. Nevertheless, as one who has spent many years in the field of labor relations, I felt it my duty, at least to the people of my State, to disclose, as clearly as I have tried to do today, exactly what my position is on the legislative proposals pending before the Congress, and what my attitude will be in my endeavor to have legislation enacted by the Congress which will meet the three criteria which I laid down earlier in my speech.

I want whatever law is passed to be fair; I want it to be moderate and reasonable. I believe we should rise to our obligations and pass only that type of legislation which meets those three tests for we in the Eightieth Congress can do serious harm to the stability of our economy by passing a strait-jacket type of legislation.

Finally, if I may strike a facetious note, let me say that I hope my friends in the Senate will understand, as a result of my 4-hour address today, that my objection to filibustering in the Senate does not at all spring from any lack of ability on my part to talk at length.

EXHIBIT 3

Area of bargaining with associations and groups of employers bargaining on a national or industry-wide scale

APPROXIMATE NUMBER OF WORKERS COVERED

Coal mining	400,000
Elevator installation and repair	3,000
Glass and glassware	60,000
Installation of automatic sprinklers	2,500
Pottery	14,000
Stoves	4,000
Wall paper	3,000
Total	486,500

POTTERY INDUSTRY—GENERAL WARE AND CHINA

Union: National Brotherhood of Operative Potters, AFL, founded in 1890. At present has approximately 22,000 members including 90 percent of workers in general ware and 65 percent of those in china. About 14,000 of these covered by one agreement with United States Potters Association representing between 60 and 80 percent of the workers in the industry.

Employers: United States Potters Association, established in 1875 primarily as a trade body. Began negotiations with union in 1894. At present has 31 member companies, 19 in general ware, and 12 in china, covering about 85 percent of each branch.

History of collective bargaining

1897: Joint support by union and association for restoration of 1890 tariff duties on pottery laid groundwork for national bargaining. However, reluctance of eastern operatives to establish a uniform wage list (based on an average of western and eastern prices) precluded a national agreement at this time.

1900: National wage scale drafted but union was unable to hold its eastern members in line under this scale. Bargaining reverted to sectional basis.

1901: Western agreement signed between brotherhood and association.

1904: Eastern agreement signed between brotherhood and association.

1905: First national agreement signed covered skilled workers in about 90 percent of general ware and 75 percent of china ware branches.

1922: Eleven-week strike over proposed reduction in wages; compromise settlement. This was the only break in union-management relations except for an abortive strike in 1917 and a number of local outlaw strikes which were repressed quickly by joint action of the brotherhood and the association.

1946: Current national agreement covers 80 percent of wage earners in general ware and 50 percent in china. Brotherhood agreements with nonassociation firms include additional 10 percent of wage earners in each branch; and in practice remaining firms tend to follow wage standards set by national agreement.

Present status

Joint collective bargaining conferences are held biennially. In event of a deadlock, a union referendum is held and union decides whether to strike or continue on employers' terms for two more years. Three joint standing committees handle the settlement of disputes involving interpretations and application of agreements, and the determination of piece rates for new types of wares or for new processes of manufacturing.

No-strike clause prohibits strikes unless or until the two national bodies have surrendered the matter to the local and company directly involved. (This has never been done.)

Stability and industrial peace

Both the association and brotherhood have a good record in the observance of the agreement:

"No system, of course, is perfect and we have had our troubles from time to time in disputes, but these are taken care of by our standing committees which are boards of arbitration with full authority to act, and their decisions are binding on both sides and neither can successfully combat such decisions.

"We believe that our long record of 38 years of friendly relations proves that this form of employer-employee relationship is satisfactory if one realized that at times they will find members on both sides who are prone to misunderstand." (Quoted in NLRB Bulletin No. 4, November 1939, p. 85; from statement of Charles P. Goodwin, secretary of the employers' association, given in Labor Relations Reporter, March 14, 1938, p. 8.)

"National collective bargaining in the general ware and china branches of the pottery industry since 1900 has helped to stabilize the industry through maintenance of wage standards.

"During the past four or five decades, the wage level in the pottery industry under national bargaining apparently has risen no more rapidly than for manufacturing in general, and the level of common-labor entrance rates in pottery is not above the average for all manufacturing.

"Wage stabilization under national bargaining in pottery seems to have operated with relatively little friction. Attempts by association firms or union locals to establish wage rates at variance with the provisions of the national agreement have been rare and unimportant. Perhaps partly because of the continuity of key personnel, the association and the brotherhood have been able to work out practical compromises and to maintain discipline." (Wages Under National and Regional Collective Bargaining, Industrial Relations Section, Princeton University, Princeton, N. J., 1946; pp. 30 and 31.)

"The oldest labor union in the United States employing collective bargaining, the brotherhood has called only two strikes in its nearly 50 years of existence—the first to establish recognition of collective bargaining when it was organized about 1893, and the second in 1922 over a wage decrease." (Courier-Express; Buffalo, N. Y., May 26, 1946.)

PRESSED AND BLOWN GLASSWARE INDUSTRY

Union: American Flint Glass Workers' Union (AFL), founded 1878, approximately 100 locals and 23,000 members.

Employers: National Association of Manufacturers of Pressed and Blown Glassware, established 1893.

History of collective bargaining

1890: Union and associated manufacturers of pressed glassware negotiated national agreements. Employer association dissolved by labor dispute in 1893.

1893: Establishment of NAMPBG; began negotiation of annual agreements for skilled departments.

1903: Star Island agreement, provides grievance and dispute procedures.

1909: Dispute in "chimney department" only break in union-management relations.

1913: U. S. Glass Co. joined association.

1937: Miscellaneous division (i. e., in addition to skilled departments), included in collective bargaining.

1943: Corning Glass Co. (largest concern in industry) organized by union (not member of association).

Present status

Joint conference decisions are binding on all members of association. Local agreements must be submitted to national organizations of both parties for approval. In practice, agreements with nonassociation members conform to industry pattern with but few exceptions.

Stability and industrial peace

Quotations from Prof. Richard Lester:

"Through uniform piece rates and minimum hourly rates for competing firms, national collective bargaining has had a stabilizing influence on the flint-glass industry during the past half century. The joint industry conferences each year have been educational, forcing both sides to think in terms of the economics of the industry. The result has been the development of responsible leadership and practical compromises. The association-union bargaining unit has also furthered stable relations by forestalling disputes arising from rival unionism.

"Excessive centralization of functions and decisions apparently has not resulted from national bargaining in flint glass.

"Through years of experience a balance has been worked out between the goal of uniform labor standards throughout the whole area of competitive production and adjustment to the variety of circumstances prevalent in different parts of the industry." (Wages Under National and Regional Collective Bargaining, Princeton University, 1946.)

1882: Another organization of workers in cloak and suit shops in New York in existence; union a local assembly of the Knights of Labor. Early unions probably shop organizations in "inside" shops.

1883: Dress and Cloak Makers' Union, an organization composed of workers in several New York shops formed. Organization grew out of a strike in a number of "inside" shops. Known as the Emigrants' Strike and won by workers.

First Cloak Manufacturers Association was formed in New York to combat the above-mentioned strike.

Gotham Knife Cutters' Association was organized by the Knights of Labor. This was the first distinct craft union in the industry.

1883–84: Formation of unions outside of New York began.

1885: General strike of cloakmakers in New York resulted in what seems to be the first record of an agreement and an arbitration committee composed of union and association representatives in the industry; agreement between the Dress and Cloak Makers' Union and members of the Cloak Manufacturers Association. Forerunner of arbitral machinery characteristic of industry.
